NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Lausanne Conference.

The Lausanne Conference remains to all intents and purposes at the exact point which it had reached a week or weeks ago. On the question as to the currency in which the Ottoman Debt is to be paid Ismet Pasha is no longer free to act as a plenipotentiary; he is the mouthpiece of Angora, and Angora, having said its say, has hung up the receiver and left the telephone. France is as much the difficulty on this subject as she is on that of German Reparations; but she continues to be able to count on the loyal support of her Allies, and the settlement of the Near East is postponed accordingly. To end the deadlock, while escaping the charge of being responsible for breaking up the Conference, the Allied Governments are understood to be trying to reach agreement on a project that would enable the Treaty of Peace to be signed without reference to the Debt question. On the latter subject the Allies' "last word" would be presented to Turkey for acceptance or rejection on the clear understanding that Constantinople would not be evacuated until it was accepted.

Bulgaria at the Conference.

In its absorption over the questions of bondholders' claims, concessions, and the evacuation of Constantinople the Conference has hardly had time to recall that the matter of a Bulgarian outlet on the Ægean Sea has not yet been arranged. At a meeting, however, of a territorial committee dealing with the final arrangements for the cession of Karagatch, the new Bulgarian delegate, M. Morfoff, was present, and repeated the statement already made verbally to the delegates of the Great Powers that, as the January proposals for providing Bulgaria with access to the Ægean Sea failed to satisfy both parties, Bulgaria considered that she has the right to regard the question as still open to further examination, which it is hoped may result in a solution of the problem. The object of this statement was to meet the contention that Bulgaria's rejection of the Allies' proposals had rendered the resumption of negotiations impossible. With regard to Karagatch M. Morfoff made a declaration to the effect that Bulgaria, while accepting the clause for the demilitarisation of the Thracian frontiers, did not see her way to affixing her signature to the article for the free passage of goods in the Karagatch triangle, inasmuch as this right was already guaranteed her by the Barcelona Agreement, and acceptance of the article in question would conflict with her attitude on the subject of access to the sea. The objection was met by the Allies' agreeing to find a place for the Transit Article in the Treaty instead of incorporating it in the Thrace Convention.

The Turkish Elections.

Mustapha Kemal Pasha has had the strength of a giant at the Turkish elections, and has used his electoral strength as a giant. In Constantinople only the candidates on the ticket of his Defence of Rights Party have been elected, and in Asia Minor, as far as the results are known, equally sweeping victories seem to have been attained. Whether Turkey still has use for giants in these days remains to be seen. It would have been thought that such trouble as there has been at Angora with the extremists would have convinced Mustapha Kemal Pasha of the wisdom of allowing their enthusiasm to be curbed by fellow-deputies rather than by the exercise of his own authority. Of the advantage to Turkey of a varied representation in the National Assembly there can be no doubt, and the efforts made to eliminate all opposition will have shaken in many quarters faith in Mustapha Kemal Pasha's statesmanship.

The Palestine Problem.

Not the least trouble that the present British Government has to put up with is that it has still to cope with an attitude of the public mind frankly sceptical of Government honesty. Whether this attitude dates from the War period, when there was some excuse for making the worse appear the better cause, or whether it is due to the events of the post-War years, when opportunism was the only policy and pledges went by the board, will no doubt be eagerly canvassed by posterity. Nowhere is the sceptical attitude towards official statements more openly shown than in the case of Palestine, in regard to which the rashest statement of the most violent Arab agitator seems to have more reliance placed upon it than is accorded to Government declarations. There is undoubtedly an Arab side to the question, as there is a Jewish side; it seems hard, however, that the British side, although often repeated, should never be considered. If the existing Administration of Palestine were as pro-Zionist and as prejudicial to Arab interests as is sometimes represented, there would be the strongest possible argument against the immediate handing-over of the country to the Arabs, in the certainty that in their present frame of mind the latter would make short shrift of the people whom, according to the same authority, Great Britain had proclaimed her special friends. Such a betrayal would be too contemptible to be considered for a moment.

Great Britain's Position.

The truth about Palestine is that its present Administration, without being ideal, is a perfectly creditable one to Great Britain. It does not fulfil the aspirations of those who voice Arab discontent, for the simple reason that the running of it is not in their hands. In support of their agitation there is a good deal that has happened since 1918 on which they can fasten, but the Arabs have never suggested that either in the theory or in the practice of government they could show any improvement on British accomplishments. It is legitimate, therefore, for the British critics of the Government to say that Palestine is Arab, and consequently must be governed by Arabs; but, if they do hold this opinion, they must candidly admit that they have no interest in good government and are even mild supporters of misgovernment. Those, on the other hand, who hold that a longer spell of good government is in the real interests of the Arabs have a strong case. Only ignorance of the actual conditions would dispute the obvious fact that the Palestine Government—to the credit of Sir Herbert Samuel, be it said—has quietly but decisively rectified the very natural mistake made in the earliest days of foreshortening the Palestine picture with the Jews in the front. Now that the Holy Land has come under British care it is too sacred a trust to hand lightly back to maladministration as bad as that of Turkey's. We cannot hold on to it for ever, but it is at least worth while seeing whether the inhabitants cannot benefit from a brief experience of honest and efficient administration, with a view to copying it themselves. Those who would promote the true interests of the Arabs would be well advised to urge them to stop their agitation and to make the most of their opportunities for qualifying as the administrators of their own land.

The Attempt on M. Pashitch.

To a long and eventful life M. Pashitch, Prime Minister of Yugoslavia, has added, in the evening of his days, a happy escape from an assassin's hand. On June 27 a youth, who would not seem to be conspicuous for his mental balance, fired four shots at M. Pashitch as he was leaving the Skupshtina, in Belgrade. The Prime Minister was only slightly injured in the hand by broken glass, and his assailant was arrested. No political significance, it is said, attaches to the crime, although, as is usual in such circumstances, the culprit seeks to invest his act with a halo. The attempt, however, calls attention to the stormy conditions that still prevail in the Balkans, where a politician's life resembles the career of a soldier of fortune winning his way at the expense of others, rather than seeking to endear himself to his fellow-countrymen by disinterested service rendered to the State.

The Patriarch Meletios IV.

Abhorrence of anything in the nature of religious persecution is so deep-seated in the British character that sympathy would instinctively be meted out to an Œcumenical Patriarch in Constantinople, who had been the victim of personal assault, as was the Patriarch Meletios the other day at the instigation, if not at the hands, of the Turks. But it is difficult to fit this particular occupant of the Patriarchal throne in the rôle of an early Christian martyr suffering for the Faith. His appointment a few years ago was connected with the bitterest phase of Greek political enmities; and his championship of the Orthodox Church has, rightly or wrongly, been associated in the public mind less with prayer and Christian precept than with carnal weapons of the most modern type. Just as the Archbishop Kyrillos, of Cyprus, is identified far more prominently with political propaganda in that island than with the spiritual care of his flock, so the Patriarch Meletios in Turkish eyes became the personification of Greek designs upon Turkey's territorial integrity. Most probably he does not bear the sole responsibility for Turkish hostility to the Patriarchate. But, most unfortunately for the Greeks, his peculiar interpretation of the duties of his sacred office have coincided with the rise of Turkish nationalism, with unhappy results for the Patriarchate. The best that could happen for the peace and prosperity of both Greece and Turkey is that the two countries should find it possible to live on good terms with one another, and to this end it would be well if the successor of Meletios IV. in the Patriarchate could inaugurate an era when the hierarchy of the Greek Church would be conspicuous for its spiritual attainments rather than for its political activities.

The Indian Army Reductions.

Last week the House of Lords discussed the reductions which have been proposed in the strength of the Army in India, but nothing new was said, and the debate was remarkable chiefly for the faithfulness with which well-known performers adhered to their familiar rôles. Lord Midleton and Lord Sydenham insisted on the danger of the internal situation as it appears to their eyes; Lord Inchcape pleaded that the "men on the spot," who have accepted his proposals, should not be interfered with from above, and Lord Haldane urged that the matter was one for experts, a contention, by the way, which Indian politicians are apt to ignore as confidently as their English brethren. To everyone Lord Peel replied that the whole question was before the Government, so that no announcement regarding it was possible, but he evidently agreed with part at least of what had been said by each speaker, and we take it that such an attitude is substantially correct. The elements of the problem are, in fact, not susceptible of precise measurement: the importance of each of them is likely to be exaggerated by individuals: and the statesmen have to strike a rough balance as best they may.

The Tata Industrial Bank.

The news that the directors of the Tata Industrial Bank propose to merge it in another institution has an interest outside purely financial circles, for it marks the failure of a great idea. The Bank was meant to facilitate the development of industries by Indians on the lines which proved so successful in Germany, and it began business with high hopes and under the guidance of some of the best financial talent in the country. The conditions, however, proved to be unfavourable; a few months ago it was decided not to take new industrial business, and if the present proposals are accepted by the shareholders, their capital will, in future, be devoted to the ordinary banking business of loans for short periods. We gather that some other institutions also have found that the financing of new industries is not good business in the conditions which now prevail in India, and men of enterprise are thus again left to rely on their own resources for raising the capital they require, a decided set-back for a country where capital is still shy.

Things and the Man.

The causes of the set-back are obvious enough to students familiar with recent economic literature. Industrial progress has always depended less on the material resources than on the human faculties which were available, and in India it is the men who must still be sought. Materials are abundant, power is available, and markets are at hand. Indian public men have urged that only capital was required to turn these resources to account, but now the offer of capital has failed, and it is to be hoped that they will profit by experience and realise that things are still waiting for men equipped with the needed qualities and aptitudes. Such men exist even now, but they are, as a rule, immersed in law, politics, or administration, and while they may talk eloquently about industrial development, they are not in a position to help it on. One must look to the rising generation for the men who will do the real work, and, as things stand in India, one must look mainly to the Universities to furnish the inspiration which is required.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

Wimbledon.

It seems that the lawn tennis championships at Wimbledon are attracting more enormous crowds than ever. Whether this increased interest in lawn tennis is a fine thing I leave for the old and the young to fight out, though no sensible man can help deploring the contemporaneous decline in the popularity of cricket, especially of village cricket; but it is quite certain that for the most part this interest in tennis is a genuine and earnest affair. Of course, one can still meet the people who know to a detail what apparel Mlle. Lenglen and Miss McKane choose to don, and have failed to observe how Mr. Johnston drives and Mr. Richards volleys; but, generally speaking, the crowds at Wimbledon have this year been more intelligent than usual. At the moment it looks as though both the singles championships will remain outside this country—with Mlle. Lenglen and Mr. Johnston—though we are now quite hardened to these things.

The Labour Conference.

The Labour Party drew the limelight on itself during the past week—first, by getting four of its members in the House suspended for childish conduct, and next, much more dully, by holding a conference in London. They are vague and emotional affairs, these Labour conferences; but presumably they do the delegates good, and, in any case, they provide the hard-up Press with useful copy, which can justify its inclusion of dreary harangues by saying that they now represent the views of the official Opposition. This year the proceedings were presided over by Mr. Sidney Webb—a guarantee of unrelieved and unrelievable gloom and of a series of lofty and inapplicable enunciations. We had the expected gush about the brotherhood of all men—the Labour Party must sentimentalise over something, and there is nothing much else at the moment to bring tears and chokes—condemnation of French conduct in the Ruhr, the conversion of the League of Nations into a world-wide organisation, and so ad infinitum. In this there is nothing except to remark that it includes all official Liberal principles of foreign policy, and so makes this partlet quite dispensable in that department, at any rate. But in home affairs the Labour Party has at last come out as definitely Socialist. That perhaps is not very definite, seeing that to dub anyone as a Socialist has changed from being a reproach into a praise, and lastly into a mere cynical expression of pitying contempt. It declares outright for a capital levy, but possibly because it sees the present impracticability of it. The Labour Party, in short, is still miles away from reality; it may contain more honest men than other parties can boast of, but the stupidity of it all is apparently incurable.

The British Air Force.

An admirable example of this stupidity of the Labour Party is to be found in their unanimous decision to offer "every resistance" to the proposed increase in the British Air Force. In the House the other day the Prime Minister laid it down that our home air fleet must be adequate to defend these islands from any force within striking distance; the air fleet is, therefore, to be doubled. Now, upon such a sensible and plain declaration the soulful Labour Party can find nothing more fantastic to say than that all air armaments must be abolished by means of an international conference. Presumably, if such a conference failed, the Labour Party would abolish the British Air Force alone—but I doubt very much whether their common sense would not then overcome their love of theory and high-sounding phrase. In point of fact, Mr. Baldwin did suggest that the best way to avoid a race of air armaments was by means of an international conference, thus completely cutting the ground from under Labour's feet.

The people of this country are very proud of their Air Force, as was proved by the enormous interest taken in the Air Pageant at Hendon on Saturday, and were never likely to allow any potential enemy to become indisputably top-dog. But, in case we are not prepared to go on constructing new machines and training men as rapidly as our super-egoists would like, there is always the possibility of an Anglo-French pact of aerial defence to fall back upon. Such a pact seems the obvious thing to bring about; but perhaps we are at present in too independent a mood for it.

of a disease which is variously called smallpox and chicken-pox. The more timid view, which coincides with the official view, as expressed in the House of Commons by Mr. Neville Chamberlain, Minister of Health, is that it is smallpox, and that there is serious danger of its spreading and of menacing the country. To this the town of Gloucester replies "Nonsense. It is chicken-pox. All this Press scare of smallpox is injuring our trade and keeping visitors away." Really Gloucester is very angry at the imputation. Not only has it made a hero of a local doctor who opposes vaccination tooth and nail, but it insults and endeavours to keep away from the city those who disagree with him. All this would be very entertaining if it did not contain an ugly element. Naturally, all that we at a safe distance can say is that discretion ought to override selfish pique, and that vaccination is a measure of normal prudence. But the smallpox microbe may have entirely changed in character, and the old vaccination may, therefore, be of no use. In any case, you cannot disturb the independence of these provincial towns; and as to the intensity of the feeling of many people against vaccination, well, anyone who was in the Army during the War can vouch to that. Call it fanaticism or ignorance or what you will; but not all the statistics in the world will overcome it. It is true that while twenty years ago 75 per cent. of the children born in this country were vaccinated and smallpox was practically extinct, to-day only 38 per cent. are vaccinated, and even in this year, so far, 955 cases have been reported; but even apparently irrefutable evidence will not subdue the prejudice against vaccination.

A Railway Crisis.

Perhaps it is only fancy, but it seems that the railway crisis, without fear of which no modern holiday is complete, has come rather later than usual this year. It is foolish, one knows, to talk lightly of so serious a subject, but it is with such dreadful monotony that Mr. J. H. Thomas discovers to the public the annual infamies of the companies' intentions. The companies have given notice of fresh proposals for the reduction in the wages of the "conciliation grades," and the publication of this intention, on the eve of the annual conference of the National Union of Railwaymen, has been quite sufficient to flutter the dovecotes of the public. But tempers are not now so fierce as they were a few years ago, and there is a reasonable probability of a settlement by arbitration. But the negotiators of it, at any rate on the employers' side, will have to be a little more sensible than were the Government during the last railway strike, when, according to Mr. Thomas, an offer was made by the companies that, no matter what the cost of living might be, wages should be fixed at 100 per cent. above pre-War standard. If such folly were the guarantee of future peace in the railway world, one can only be thankful that we have this scare of a strike but once in the year.

The Royal Marines.

One of the saddest sights which the 1914-1918 man has had to witness is the enforced disappearance of the unit with which he served in the War. Esprit de corps dies very hard, and to see one's old unit disappear, or be merged in another, or change completely its raison d'être, has gone very much against the grain. Now even the Royal Marine Artillery and the Royal Marine Light Infantry have come to it. According to a Fleet Order issued the other day, they are to be amalgamated, and are to be known in future as the Royal Marines.

It is stated that the change will be more one of sentiment than of service, but everyone will regret that the "Blue Marine" and the "Red Marine" are not each to continue his separate existence. Apparently the Navy thought that an infantry force would be more useful to them than a force with a high standard of land artillery. Alter Ego.

WEDDING.

Mr. Ronald Storrs and Mrs. Clowes.

The marriage took place on July 2, at St. Peter's Church, Eaton Square, of Mr. Ronald Storrs, C.M.G., C.B.E., Governor of Jerusalem, son of the Dean of Rochester and the late Hon. Mrs. Storrs, and Mrs. Louisa Lucy Clowes, widow of Lieutenant-Colonel H. Clowes (late 1st Life Guards) and daughter of the late Rear-Admiral the Hon. Algernon Littleton and of Lady Margaret Littleton, sister of the late Earl of Kilmorey.

Mrs. Clowes was given away by her uncle, the Hon. Henry Littleton. The Dean of Rochester officiated, assisted by the Rev. Christopher Storrs and the Rev. Austin Thompson. Mr. Edward Marsh, C.B., was best man. No invitations were issued, and there was no reception owing to the deep mourning in the bridegroom's family. Among the relatives and friends present at the church were:—

Lady Margaret Littleton, Miss Hyacinth and Miss Eleanor Littleton, Lord and Lady Brownlow, Miss Monica and Miss Petronella Storrs, Miss Haynes Storrs, Miss Mary, Miss Lucy, and Miss Daisy Clowes (daughters of the bride), Mr. L. Cairo, June 23.

Another Air Disaster.

Cairo was shocked on Monday by news of yet another fatal aeroplane accident to add to the already long list of such occurrences. It is only a few weeks ago that two airmen were killed and two others seriously injured through their machine getting out of control and crashing on the Mokattam Hills. Monday's smash was still more costly in human life. A Vickers-Vimy machine, which had been undergoing repairs, had left the ground and had risen no higher than about 300 feet, when it was seen to get out of control. The aeroplane crashed, and immediately burst into flames. The four occupants were: Flying Officer P. W. Lingwood, who was piloting the machine; Flight-Lieutenant N. B. Ward, and Aircraftsmen Jarvis and Skuse. By the time the fire could be mastered the bodies of all four of these unfortunate men had been incinerated. Flying Officer Lingwood was married, and his wife and child are in Egypt; the others were unmarried. All the victims were twenty-seven years of age. The funeral took place at the British Cemetery, Old Cairo, on Tuesday afternoon.

The Court at Alexandria.

With the transfer of the Court and the Residency to Alexandria, which has been effected this week, Cairo is officially abandoned to its summer torpor. This year King Fuad will spend the whole of the summer at Montaza Palace, only going into town, to Ras el Tin Palace, when formal business requires. Those who know Montaza are not surprised by His Majesty's decision to stay there. During the War Montaza Palace was used as a military hospital, and fortunate indeed were the men who were sent there for treatment. It was only in the spring of last year that the building was again fitted out for its normal rôle of royal residence. The grounds are large and delightful, full of shady walks, and running right down to the seashore. For the royal children, Crown Prince Farouk and his sister, Princess Fewkia, Montaza is ideal.

The Residency's Quarters.

The Residency has gone into new quarters this year. For some years past the greatly increased size of the Chancery staff, as compared with pre-War days, has made the Agency building at Alexandria, which was constructed by Lord Cromer, inadequate. It has, therefore, been necessary to seek other accommodation, and the house of Zervudachi Bey has been rented each summer. This is a charming residence, with a garden rivalling that of the Residency at Kasr el Doubara, but it is none too large, and is situated at Glymenopoulo, far out in the suburb of Ramleh. Also the rent has been very high. During the past winter funds have been allocated for building a Chancery section on to the old Agency. The work was completed a few weeks back, and it is into the new building that the Residency staff moved this week. Located at Mustapha Pasha, the High Commissioner's summer home is certainly more conveniently situated than the Zervudachi house, though it is rather a long way from the sea. The change should prove a great economy, for I am told that the cost of the new Chancery will be recovered in two years' saving of the rent paid for the Zervudachi mansion.

The Indemnity Act.

Daily the Arabic newspapers announce that "the Indemnity Act will be promulgated to-morrow or the day after," and, with equal regularity, to-morrow never comes. But at last it seems that the prophets are to be justified. The draft Act has been agreed upon between the British and Egyptian Governments, and now awaits only the completion and enactment of a number of other laws which will come into force as soon as martial law is removed. One of the most important of these new legislative measures is an Egyptian code of martial law, together with the regulations governing its employment. It is reported that the terms of the new statute are settled, and that it will probably be issued by royal decree during the coming week. After that the Indemnity Act will not be long delayed, and then, with the abolition of the existing martial law régime, Egypt will be fairly launched along the highway of independence. It will be interesting to see whether the Prime Minister, having accomplished so much in so short a time, will consider his task at an end, or will remain at his post right up to the elections. Since he assumed office Yehia Pasha Ibrahim has maintained a Sphinx-like silence, having made no political speeches, issued practically no communiqués or statements, and given purely general replies to the questions of interviewers. This silence at first antagonised a section of the Arabic Press, but now that the Ministry has "delivered the goods" in so striking a fashion there is little real opposition to the Government. The recently issued law for the regulation of public gatherings has been much criticised, and fears are expressed regarding new "shackles" with which the Act of Indemnity may burden the country; but, generally speaking, the present Government has met with a remarkable measure of support from all sections of the local Press.

It is understood that the Premier intends, as soon as the Indemnity Act is promulgated and martial law removed, to break his silence and to seek an early opportunity of giving the country a compte-rendu of what has been done and what still remains to do. This speech will doubtless be delivered at a banquet held to celebrate the passing of martial law.

The Position of Foreign Officials.

It is satisfactory to learn that there are good prospects of a definite scheme being agreed upon as to the position of foreign officials in the Government service. In my letter of June 2 I referred to the failure of the Government last year to come to a satisfactory arrangement which would have enabled them to dispense with those foreign officials whom they did not wish to retain, on payment of good compensation, and at the same time to make terms with those whose services are still indispensable. Fear of public opposition has been the motive underlying the failure to settle this compensation question. Recently the Egyptian Government asked for an "armistice," their request being that no more foreign officials should go until a cut-and-dried scheme had been agreed upon. Realising, no doubt, that to agree to this proposal would serve only further to delay any settlement, the Residency declined. If the projected agreement is reached, Government and foreign officials alike will at last know where they stand, and will be able to make their plans for the future accordingly.

The Assouan Dam Tablet.

The removal at the end of last March from Assouan Dam of the tablet erected to commemorate the part played in the building of the dam by engineers and workmen of various nationalities aroused much comment at the time. The inscription was as follows:—"This dam was designed and built by British engineers. Egyptians, assisted by Greeks, excavated to the rock foundations and built the rubble masonry. Skilled Italian workmen dressed the granite ashlar." This wording was considered offensive to Egyptian pride, and the tablet was removed in circumstances which suggested a desire for secrecy. The matter was taken up strongly by the British Union in Egypt, and after much correspondence, the Council of the Union has now been informed by the Residency that a new tablet is to be erected. This is to be a much larger affair than its predecessor, and the inscription, besides naming the ex-Khedive, the three British Consuls-General, and the two Ministers of Public Works who held office during the building of the dam also enumerates the leading engineers and contractors who had a share in the work. A modified form of the original inscription will follow the list of names, the new reading being as follows:—"The labour employed was Egyptian and Greek. Skilled Italian workmen dressed and built the granite ashlar."

The new tablet is undoubtedly a great improvement on the old, and of far more value as an historical record. At the same time the circumstances in which the removal was effected suggest that had it not been for the publicity given to the removal and the action taken by the British Union, the present satisfactory termination to the incident might not have been reached.

The Conspiracy Trial.

The conspiracy trial drags on. Recent sessions have served to postpone rather than to bring nearer the conclusion. Almost every witness who has been called during the last few days has given evidence which will involve hearing two or three other witnesses in corroboration or refutation. By the third week in July we may see the end of the trial, in which public interest has now almost completely evaporated.

BULGARIA.

Sofia, June 26.

The Coup and Afterwards.

The first stage of the coup may now be said to be over. All is quiet in the provinces, and the new Government is gradually reorganising the administrative services. In foreign affairs matters are not going so smoothly. The Serbians have still two to three divisions concentrated along the Bulgarian frontier. This concentration is rendering official circles in Sofia somewhat uneasy. M. Nintchitch's speech in the Skupshtina regarding Serbo-Bulgarian relations was of a reassuring character, and it was thought that the Serbian troops would return to their ordinary stations. No pronouncement has been made as to why the troops remain concentrated. Their presence is a distinct danger to friendly relations, because, as all the world knows, frontiers are places where a mere incident may lead to grave trouble. In this particular case the situation is aggravated by the attitude which M. Raiko Daskaloff, lately Bulgarian Minister in Prague, has taken up. M. Daskaloff is uttering dire threats against the new Bulgarian Government, and it is to be feared that some of these threats are being taken too seriously. The enemies of Bulgaria—and they are numerous—pretend that Serbia must hold in readiness large military forces in order to prevent internal Bulgarian troubles spreading to other Balkan countries. These pretensions are, for the moment at any rate, quite groundless, as besides the absence of internal troubles, the new Government is far too occupied with its own affairs to dream of an aggressive foreign policy.

The Macedonians.

No one has come more into the limelight during recent events than the Macedonian Autonomists. Their leader, M. Todor Alexandroff, is alternately reported as driving about Sofia in a motor-car, or organising a huge Macedonian revolt which will change the map of South-Western Europe. His supporters are said to have entered Bulgaria in their thousands, and the number of Macedonians who chased and ultimately killed Stambolisky is fabulous. One story has gone the rounds that just outside Sofia is a battalion of troops exclusively composed of Macedonian komitajis!

In spite of this badinage, there is not a shadow of doubt that the Macedonians look on recent happenings with great satisfaction, and certain among them desire to profit thereby. Stambolisky's death brought to an end a Government which had been quite out of sympathy with the Macedonians. The latter realise that they are in a strong position, but do not perhaps realise the responsibility of their position. M. Zankoff's Government will have to see that it does not fall into the old error of allowing the Macedonians to control Bulgaria's foreign policy. If they make this mistake, Serbia will always be a potential enemy, and Bulgaria's international position will be gravely jeopardised. The new Government has a very difficult task before it, as it has to follow a policy in which Macedonian ambitions and Serbian mistrust will not harm Bulgaria.

The Communists' Attitude.

In the midst of all that has happened, the Communist Party has been more or less forgotten. It does not form part of the new Government, but it has not shown any active resistance to the coup. The party is, however, watching events very attentively, and will, in all probability, shortly announce the policy it intends to follow. Circumstances would seem to point to a combination of extreme Agrarianism with Communism. The Communists cannot be content with the change in régime, as it most certainly represents a move towards the "Right." They were, it is true, menaced by a law which Stambolisky was to have had voted by the present Sobranye. In fact, on the face of things, all parties are against them. Still, their ideas are more closely allied to those of the Agrarians than to those of the Bourgeois.

The Government has announced that there will be no interference with the Communists provided that they conduct themselves according to the laws of the country. Whether there will be an increase in Communism as the result of the recent change in Government it is hard to say, but a strong current of opinion holds that the greatest opposition which M. Zankoff may have to face is a Communist-Extreme Agrarian bloc.

A Suggested Bourgeois Fusion.

The Bourgeois Parties in Bulgaria number five —namely, the Democrats, Narodniaks, Radicals, Liberals, and Socialists. In general there is very little between the policies of all five parties. For this reason, and also because it is now realised somewhat tardily that "Union means strength" (the words engraved on the front of the Sobranye), there is talk of a fusion.

The Democrats, Narodniaks, and Radicals, who at present form a bloc, were the first to take the initiative. Their idea is to form one party, which it is hoped the Liberals and the Socialists will join. Public opinion is almost unanimous in welcoming the proposed fusion. Five parties are four too many, and individually can achieve nothing. There are, unfortunately, several obstacles to the fusion, of which the principal are the natural reluctance of the respective parties to lose their identities, and, more important still, the personal ambitions of some of the members of each party. If these two obstacles can be overcome, there is nothing to prevent a slow but gradual fusion, and it will certainly be in the interests of the parties concerned and of Bulgaria as a country if it takes place.

The Arrested Ministers.

Members of no less than five former Cabinets are at present in prison—those of MM. Radoslavoff, Stambolisky, Gueshoff, Daneff, and Malinoff. It is to the three last-named, who are at Shumen, that interest mainly attaches. When M. Zankoff's Government assumed power it announced that the Shumen Ministers were liberated. It has since come to light that they are still under arrest. Meanwhile several of the Ministers who formed part of the arrested Cabinets, but who escaped abroad, have returned and are at liberty. Such an anomaly has called forth strong protests from those interested. The Government's policy in this matter is hard to follow. It is said that it does not wish to release the Ministers, as this would be a breach of the Constitution. On the other hand, it is said that the Liberal element in the Cabinet, which is, curiously enough, represented by M. Smiloff, Minister of Justice, insists on the liberation of the Radoslavoff Ministers as well as those from Shumen. Altogether the situation is very complicated, and if it is allowed to continue may easily become a source of considerable embarrassment to M. Zankoff's administration.

The Resignation of the Arab Nominees.

There is no disguising the surprise felt here at the unanimous resignation of the ten Arab nominees to the reconstructed Palestinian Advisory Council. The uncertainty which prevailed up till last Tuesday, and the succession of contradictory announcements, seemed to argue that the "moderates" among the ten refused to be stampeded into resignation at the dictation of the political extremists. The nominees had been carefully and cleverly chosen by the local Government, and included a representative from each of the main families, and among them such a well-known moderate and sane man of the world as Ragheb Bey en-Nashashibi, a capable business man, friendly alike to British government and to the prospects of Jewish assistance in Palestine. There were others also who had not previously mixed themselves up in the welter of Palestinian politics. But finally seven of the ten signed a common letter of "resignation," and the three others telegraphed their concurrence with the majority.

Primarily this last development is the first real proof of Arab solidarity. So far it has always been possible to say that what opposition there has been to Government proposals has come from just an extremist section, and that there was a body of Arab moderates who concurred with British policy. Now the unorganised moderates have either agreed with, or allowed themselves to be overpersuaded by the organised extreme faction. It is not easy to say what exactly has effected this consolidation of parties (over and above the outstanding grievance against the Mandate policy of a Jewish National Home—always, for purposes of argument, envisaged by the Arabs according to its maximum interpretation). There is unquestionably a feeling that the British Government has been playing an insincere game—giving with one hand and taking away with the other—a double policy of promises of self-government in things immaterial and of dictation of terms in anything that matters. But it is the lesser things which tend to be most irritating, and the fact that the Arab members of the Council were nominated, while the two Jews were formally elected, has—most unreasonably, of course, since the Arabs refused to elect when asked to—provided the Arabs with a grievance; they felt that as mere nominees they could never pretend, to the same extent as the popularly elected Jews, to voice the wants and feelings of their people.

What the next move is to be is impossible to forecast. The line of least resistance would seem to be to revive the old Advisory Council unchanged; but it is most improbable now that any of the Arab notables will dare to sit on it. There is to be a "Sixth Arab Congress" at Jaffa to-morrow. It is to be held behind closed doors "owing to the delicate nature of the agenda"—the Anglo-Arab Treaty, the attitude to the Advisory Council, and the question of a general Arab levy for raising funds for Arab Nationalist propaganda.

The two Jewish members elected to the Advisory Council are Mr. H. M. Kalvarisky and Mr. David Yellin. The former is an old colonist of Rosh Pinnah (North Galilee), who has in the last two years played an active part in devising means for promoting an Arab-Jewish entente; and the latter comes of a family settled in Palestine for many generations, well known to the Arabs, a learned Arabist, and respected in all quarters. The Jewish "secondary voters" of the "Left" refrained from electing.

The High Commissioner's Northern Tour.

During the past week the High Commissioner has been making a tour in the North, chiefly to visit the revised northern frontier. Since the departure of General Gouraud the difficulties about the inclusion in Palestine of certain territory in the neighbourhood of Lake Huleh, comprising twenty-six villages and settlements, have been surmounted. Certain minor legal technicalities have not yet been completed, and Sir Herbert Samuel could not formally take over the district in question on behalf of the British Mandatory. But since he is to return to England on leave in a week's time he took the opportunity of an unofficial tour of inspection of the new frontier, in the company of the French liaison officer and the French Governor of Sidon. The chief points visited in the new area were Metullah, the most northerly Jewish settlement, and Banias, the Biblical Dan. Immense enthusiasm was shown by the Jewish colonists. It was on Sunday night, after this visit to Metullah, that the attack was made on the small party of British gendarmerie. It was not an attack on the High Commissioner himself, but on a portion of his escort returning to Safed. Ten of these, travelling in two cars, were stopped by a party of twenty to thirty armed brigands near Yesod ha-Maaleh, another Jewish settlement, south-west of Lake Huleh. The attack had no political motive, and appears to have been nothing more than an ordinary "hold-up," not uncommon in Palestine, for the sole object of loot. The brigands soon discovered the nature of their "haul," fired a single volley, and promptly disappeared. Two of the gendarmerie were killed outright, and two were severely wounded—one of whom died shortly afterwards. The three victims were buried at Nazareth the following Tuesday.

A story was current in Jerusalem during the next few days to the effect that the attack was engineered by French sources as a reprisal for the similar attack some time back on General Gouraud, when the culprits escaped to Transjordania, and the British authorities were openly blamed for not taking the necessary measures to hand them back to the French. But this was soon shown to be groundless. Last Tuesday the French succeeded in capturing the entire band, with one exception. They are believed to have been a famous band of Druze outlaws long wanted by the Syrian authorities.

The Elections.

Last Friday we reached one of the culminating points in the election campaign in Constantinople, when the urns containing all the voting papers of the second degree electors of Pera were transferred in gaily decorated carriages accompanied by unending streams of cabs and motor-cars to the Lycie Galata Serai, and there handed over to the Election Commission. The outward manifestations of interest in the proceedings were somewhat overwhelming, and it is estimated that altogether some 30,000 or 40,000 people took part, as spectators or participants, in the various processions. The congestion at the rallying point on Taxim Parade Ground was appalling, and one wondered whether the various processions would ever get sorted out; however, all seems to have gone off very successfully, and it must be admitted that for an election crowd they were the most orderly, well-behaved lot we have ever seen.

The counting of the votes went on throughout Friday evening, and the result was announced on Saturday. It appears that the 1,275 elected members of the College of Voters all belong to the Government (Defence of Rights) Party, and that 95 per cent. of the population of Pera recorded their votes. The College of Voters will meet at 8 a.m. next Thursday in the Lecture Hall of Stamboul University to carry out the final election of the candidates.

Reports received from other parts of Turkey show that everywhere the results of elections give the same overwhelming preponderance to the Government Party, and it looks as though, in the new Assembly, there will be no opposition at all. Appearances are, however, deceptive. We have been treated lately to an orgy of oratory and congratulatory telegrams, which appear to demonstrate the absolute political unity of all classes and races in Turkey. The Greek communities in Constantinople have been wiring fulsome messages to Mustapha Kemal. The Armenian authorities have been buttering their Turkish lords and masters, and so forth. The opposition elements among the Turks themselves have been dumb, because the moment for the bold expression of "unorthodox" opinions is not propitious. Those touching manifestations of national unity must not be taken at their face value.

The "Free" Vote.

It is common knowledge that in many countries in Eastern Europe, where the educational standard of the electorate is much higher than it is in Turkey, elections are subject to arrangement, and we should be guilty of childish credulity if we supposed that under present conditions in Turkey a certain amount of undue influence were not exercised. Undue pressure is unquestionably at work everywhere, and, however deplorable this may seem from the point of view of the sanctity of democratic institutions, we feel almost inclined to consider it justified, since, owing to the elementary party organisation in a country like Turkey, the party which has succeeded in evolving any organised system for getting the electors' votes, deserves to get them.

Mistrust of Constantinople.

Whether the Government will succeed in keeping its team together, now that it has done its work so well that it has virtually deprived itself of the necessary cement provided by an opposition element of reasonable strength, remains to be seen. We are very sceptical about it, and it seems to us a fact of bad augury that the Angora powers-that-be have thought it necessary to restrict the representation of Constantinople to fifteen Deputies—i.e., 5 per cent. of the total Chamber, whereas the population of the town represents at least 10 per cent. of the whole population of New Turkey.

The Return from Angora.

The negotiations at Angora between the Government and the representatives of the Foreign Companies have reached a definite stage, in that practically all the delegates have returned. Some agreements have certainly been reached, but we believe that we are right in stating that, with the exception of the Constantinople Telephone Company, all the British companies have found the Government's terms impossible as a basis for future working. This situation, taken in conjunction with the deadlock on this and the Debt question at Lausanne, is a serious one for the Turks themselves, for the good reason that, even if they fight about it—and it is pretty certain that they will not, because their Army is not in a fit state to fight anybody—they will not alter their financial relations with the rest of the world, except for the worst. They still persist, however, in their stupid provocation of the foreign investor; they are still obstructive on the Bank of Athens question; they have actually confused a legal document, which they presented to the National Bank of Turkey, to prove the legality of their contention that the various claims in the contract concerning the Municipal Loan of 1909, which expressly stipulates payment in gold, really mean payment in paper; they have succeeded in putting up the backs of the British, French, Dutch, Swiss and other investors in Ottoman external loans. Do they really think that any further attempt to raise money in London or Paris would have the slightest chance of success? No; financially, they risk dropping to the level of Russia or some of the smaller South and Central American Republics.

Turkish Financial Ideas.

We strongly suspect that in this intransigeance on financial questions they have been powerfully influenced by the virus injected into their body politic by their ex-friends, the Russians. The repudiation of responsibility for the obligations contracted by the Imperial Ottoman Government is an attractive idea, and has apparently been on the tapis for some time in a veiled form. Traces are also to be found of that pet Muscovite idea, that the wicked people who are creditors of foreign States are a small group of enormously wealthy evil-living plutocrats who grind the faces of the foreign poor. The sooner the Turks disabuse themselves of this notion and get at the truth, namely, that the man to whom he owes money and from whom he hopes to get more, is the moderately shrewd, cautious man in the street in England, France, and elsewhere, who will button up his pocket resolutely if his dividends do not come in regularly, the better for the Turk and the future of "New Turkey."

YUGOSLAVIA'S PROBLEM.

On the following page we publish a letter from a prominent Croat, who challenges the statement of policy made in our issue of May 31 by M. Raditch, the Croat leader. The two documents reflect the rival schools of thought that hold the field in Yugoslavia to-day. Dr. Ravnihar, it is true, is not as extreme a Centralist as are most of the Serbian Radicals. He realises the need for amendments of the Vidovdan Constitution; but he finds it on the whole up-to-date and democratic, and fulfilling the essential requirement of keeping Yugoslavia strong in the political, military, and economic spheres. His summing up of the Centralist creed would probably receive M. Pashitch's full endorsement: "Unfortunately, through no fault of our State," he writes, "conditions are still such that we have to stand on guard, arms in hand, in defence of our dearly won freedom and independence. . . . We cannot atomise our united State, because that would be the end of its political and economic independence." Finding themselves confronted with difficulties of one kind or another on every frontier, it is hardly to be wondered at that the Serbians are impressed by the necessity of maintaining the military strength of Yugoslavia at the standard which only a united and unified country can attain, and they point to the improvement of their relations with Italy as proof of the correctness of this view. At the same time, the Centralists are equally convinced that only close co-operation and co-ordination in the economic sphere can pave the way for the material reconstruction of which the State stands in need, and will avert worse financial difficulties than those which have already been experienced.

Against these arguments M. Raditch has little more to offer than the assertion of the unshakable resolve of Croatia to be "independent" and a denunciation of Serbian militarism and violence. Dr. Ravnihar shrewdly places his finger on the weak spot of the Croat leader's letter in pointing out that the emphasis laid on pacifism and neutrality is directed entirely to foreign audiences, and he accuses him of trying to force his policy on the country by means of foreign backing because he cannot obtain support for it in Yugoslavia. Again, a strictly dispassionate view will probably find in M. Raditch's policy more that is sound or justifiable than his political opponents will allow. The fact that Yugoslavia comprises three separate peoples, Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, who, while united in race and language, differ in many other respects, and not least of all in their political traditions, is a strong argument for a federal State. In view of the political backwardness of the great mass of the Yugoslav population, it is only natural that the different communities should find their own local problems all-important and all-absorbing, and take comparatively little interest in the affairs of other sections of the composite State. It is not only on the problem of Fiume that the Croats and Slovenes hold that the Belgrade Government is less watchful in regard to their interests than it is in matters which more directly concern the Serbs, as, for instance, the question of a port zone at Salonika. On the other hand, if they stopped to consider how an independent pacifist Croatia would, in all probability, have fared in negotiations with Italy over the Fiume problem, they would have to admit that "militarist" Serbia has been of some use to them. Nevertheless, there can be little doubt that the present condition of the different provinces calls for a generous measure of local self-government and decentralisation of the administrative machinery. The absence of a reasoned programme in M. Raditch's statement of the Croatian point of view lends colour to the charge that personal ambition rather than political conviction is his guiding motive. He has taken advantage of the distrust felt by the Croatian peasant of Serbian economic competition in order to rally Croatia as a whole to his standard; but, being unable to support his separatist slogan by any constructive policy that could withstand criticism in Parliament, he is content with a negative attitude, however prejudicial to Yugoslavia's interests the political deadlock may be.

To the outside world it does not seem as if the two schools of thought in Yugoslavia are divided by a very wide gulf. Only a comparatively small step on the part of each in the required direction would bring the two together. On the one side the military danger is exaggerated, and is capable of being eliminated by a careful foreign policy; at the same time, the multiplicity of purely local interests is an obvious factor in the situation, and in view of the undeveloped condition of the political sense of the Yugoslav race as a whole can be best met by means of local legislative bodies. The recent General Election was decided almost entirely on racial lines, although the Radicals claim for the first time adherents outside Serbia proper; certainly as "Centralists" they could derive little satisfaction from it. To attempt to suppress the autonomist feeling by force is the surest means of courting disaster for Yugoslavia. There is nothing antagonistic in the different local interests; they are capable of being met in whole or in part without prejudice to the united State, and, when once out of the way, will leave the arguments for unity unchallengeable. It is believed that M. Pashitch appreciates these facts, and is prepared to modify his Centralist policy. Unfortunately, he receives no help from M. Raditch, who does not seem to realise that a purely negative policy, which may have served Croatia's ends when she was firmly held in the toils of the Dual Monarchy, is out of place when Croatia is in a position to play her part in the direction of Yugoslav affairs. He must know well that local autonomy is possible without the fetish of republicanism. What he probably does not realise is that many of the points of dispute between Croatia and Serbia that loom large to-day are essentially part of the aftermath of war, and will be more easily eliminated if they are not invested with the importance of fundamental differences. It will, indeed, be a strange irony if the Yugoslavs, who showed such a capacity for sacrifice in the War, are unable to reach the same standard of patriotism in dealing with their peace problems.

CROATIA AND SERBIA.

A REPLY TO M. RADITCH.*

We have received from Dr. Vladimir Ravnihar the following letter, dated Liubliana, June 17. Dr. Ravnihar is President of the Central Committee of the Yugoslav Sokol Union, and is President of the Liubliana Glasbena Matica (Conservatoire). He is not a member of the Radical Party.

For some time past it has been the policy of M. Stefan Raditch to try to interest foreign public opinion in the idea of his "humanitarian and pacific Croatian Republic." It does not say much for the persuasiveness of any doctrine if its propagator is compelled to turn for help to factors outside those directly concerned—in this case the Croat people and the State of Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, established by international Acts and enjoying valid existence. The matter is absolutely our own internal affair, in which—by international right and custom—no external factor can proffer help so long as no international interests are involved. Of this M. Raditch must be fully aware, as he is a man of wide knowledge, who passed through the Ecole des Sciences Politiques in Paris and studied politics at sundry other universities as well. It is a great pity that a man of M. Raditch's accomplishments should not employ the latter for the true advantage of his nation, and that his practical politics should so belie his education. Well equipped as regards theory, he fails to find the moral strength to turn it to use in practical life.

His demagogy is a further outcome of the contradictory nature of his character. Now, demagogy is the natural opposite of all true culture of mind and heart.

Demagogues are the very worst teachers a nation can have, because for their own advantage they flatter its lowest instincts, relying on these for support, and so beguile the people to moral ruin. The true friend of his people uses all his knowledge and culture to fight these instincts, even though this be at times against his own interest. It is for him to give—if need be, to impose—political orientation upon the people, not to accept it himself from an ignorant populace.

The demagogue is in clover just now. Unsettled post-War conditions, an unsatisfactory economical situation, the high cost of living—all facilitate his task. Consequently it would be a mistake to ascribe the outcome of the recent General Election in Croatia (or in Slovenia either, for that matter) to an expression of "the will of the people," as M. Raditch does—against his better knowledge.

The Croat peasant is a good fellow, but politically an illiterate. And it must be accounted a fault of the Croat professional classes (the intelligenzia) that they have not troubled to give the populace a political education. Before the Liberation there was no need for it either. At that time there was in Croatia no such thing as universal, equal, and secret suffrage, that essential factor in the political training of a people. Elections were carried out on the Magyar system, and the voters persuaded with wine, gulyash, money, and—at need—with gendarmes. The more ignorant the populace the better for the candidate. Universal, equal, and secret suffrage, the product of modern democratic conceptions, was given to the Croat along with the rest of the State by the much-abused Vidovdan Constitution (as it is called). To speak of any kind of political "will" on the part of the politically ignorant mass of the Croatian people is nonsense. If it succeeded in expressing a "will" at the election, it is quite safe to say that this "will" was suggested by its leaders; and, moreover, by leaders (fateful circumstance!) who were demagogues.

The Croatian peasant is not a Republican by temperament nor by his way of thinking. By all their past and all their traditions the Croats are Monarchists, and have been so ever since the days when they were ruled by native kings. Let me recall the enthusiasm with which they greeted our Queen (the Queen of Yugoslavia) during her recent stay in the Croatian littoral! But if you keep on preaching to that peasantry night and day that a Republic is a kind of State in which there is no need to pay taxes or to serve in the army; that neither police nor officials are required to run it—well, where is the peasant who would not vote for such an earthly paradise? And that is the kind of demagogic agitation which their political leaders made use of, and, first and foremost, M. Raditch himself. If we, therefore, need not marvel at the outcome of the General Election, we need not overestimate it either. Above all, we ought not to take it as the expression of any kind of "will." That "will" was expressed under the pressure of suggestion on the part of those who desire to exploit it for their own selfish ends.

M. Raditch knows very well that, in view of established international relations and in consideration of international right, his propaganda abroad cannot meet with practical success. Therefore he tries through his propaganda to create an international situation which would favour his purpose. That is the true explanation of his theories touching the neutralisation of the east coast of the Adriatic; of his efforts to paint the Serb as a kind of modern Hun, prepared to devastate Northern Italy right down to Milan; of his sally against a Panslav "militarist" State extending from Vladivostok to Split! M. Raditch is speculating upon Rome's "well-grounded alarm" to be his most reliable ally in the realisation of his aims. He would neutralise the east coast of the Adriatic, sacrifice Trieste and Gorizia in order to flatter Imperialist Italy, through whom he would fain strangle "Serbian Imperialism." And in the resultant, tiny, neutral Croatian Republic, under Italian protectorate he—Raditch—would rule as President!

Pray, consider what view an English judge would be perfectly justified in taking if a British subject were to indulge in some analogous propaganda abroad. It strikes me that such propaganda is, indeed, not far removed from treason. And if we, furthermore, consider that these monstrous utterances do not only remain unpunished over here, but that our Government is actually negotiating with their originator—just for the sake of arriving at an understanding with the Croats, surely that is proof conclusive that the subjects of this State enjoy as much liberty as any in the world. To talk in this vein, and then in the same breath to speak of the tyranny of the Serbs, is a sin against the ignorance of British public opinion no less than an insult to its intelligence. It is a contradictio in adiecto.

I should not have troubled to reply to M. Raditch's crazy disquisition had the latter not appeared in that highly esteemed London weekly The Near East. And my decision to reply was prompted, above all, by a wish to protect foreign opinion against being shamelessly hoodwinked. For goodness' sake, is there really anybody who would believe the tale that in Macedonia the Serbs (i.e., the Radicals) caused sixty-eight peasants to be shot before the elections merely because they wished to nominate an independent Macedonian candidate? This, on top of those free elections, as a result of which, coupled with free, unhindered, not to say, unbridled, agitation, the Republican Raditch and his sixty-nine comrades have triumphed in our kingdom! When a man has just scored an electoral success of such signal dimensions, and then talks of unheard-of coercion on the part of the Government, the contradictory nature of his statement must be patent to every impartial reader, who will then take the rest of M. Raditch's argumentation at its proper value. And he will be finally put off when he learns that M. Raditch wittingly mixed up those sixty-eight peasants with Bulgarian komitajis, who harry our frontiers day and night and commit the most horrible outrages upon our populations there.

To contrast the peace-loving disposition of the Croats and their humanitarian standpoint with the Serbs is more than out of place. There is not an intelligent man in our State, no matter what branch of the nation he may happen to belong to, who is not a pacifist, and does not desire that the nations of this earth should progress in the direction of pure humanitarianism. Unfortunately, through no fault of our State, conditions are still such that we have to stand on guard, arms in hand, in defence of our dearly won freedom and independence. Our national army is an admirable weapon of defence against foes from without and—at need—also from within. I should not wonder if here lies the chief reason why M. Raditch is a pacifist. . . .

M. Raditch's Republic will not bear discussion. If he insists upon it, all agreement—such as is honestly desired by the Serbian people no less than by the Government—is impossible. We cannot atomise our united State, because that would be the end of its political and economic independence. True, Serbia could still carry on her independent existence in the comity of nations. Even without the Croats and Slovenes she would remain a notable factor in international life, nor would she need the trusteeship of the Great Powers, as Turkey used to do. The same cannot be said of a Croatian Republic, unsuitable already as such for federation with Serbia; and still less does it apply to a liliputian Slovene statelet. From an economic standpoint both would be impossible creations, incapable of life.

It is interesting to note what M. Raditch has to say about the partitioning of our State. The Croatian Republic is to consist of Croatia, Slavonia, and Dalmatia. Slovenia, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Batchka, the Banat, and Montenegro are to decide by plebiscite whether they wish to belong to a "militarist" kingdom of Serbia or to a pacific and neutral Republic of Croatia. M. Raditch does not attempt to draw the dividing lines according to the national branches—Serbs, Croats, Slovenes—"in the lump"; he divides by provinces, that unhappy legacy of our enforced historical development. Our Prime Minister, M. Pashitch, was fully justified when in a recent speech he reproached "Pretchanski" (from across the rivers, i.e., the provinces formerly part of Austria-Hungary) politics with displaying an Austro-Hungarian mentality. Of course, partition according to national denominations would be by no means easy, because all along our ostensible ethnic frontiers the three branches of our nation emerge so imperceptibly into one another, and because there are such considerable settlements of one branch to be found in the territory of the other that partition on those lines is well-nigh impossible, proof of the intrinsic unity of the Yugoslav nation.

The true solution of the "Serbo-Croat Question," as M. Raditch calls it, is to be sought in a totally different direction from that indicated by himself. Besides an occupation of Croatia or the recognition of an independent Croatian Parliament, there is a third way. It is a living side by side, based upon the fundamental principles of the Vidovdan Constitution, which guarantees to each citizen of the State perfect freedom, regardless of local or religious denomination. Give us a few desirable amendments to this on the whole up-to-date and democratic Constitution, so as to improve the administration and reduce its cost. Let the administration be as widely decentralised as possible, and for the love of peace let us establish autonomous local legislative bodies within the frame of the laws of the realm. All these things can be discussed and amicably settled.

Finally, M. Raditch is not in principle such an opponent of the Vidovdan Constitution. Without demur he accepted the mandate as deputy in the Belgrade Parliament. We are accustomed to such lack of logic on his part. Let him take heart and go yet one step further. The Croatian peasant will certainly raise no objection; at the worst, he may not thank his leader for bringing him by such devious paths and through so many moral and material sacrifices to the point whence our young statesmanship ought to enter upon its development.

AN OBSERVER IN MOROCCO.

"OLD MOROCCO AND THE FORBIDDEN ATLAS." By C. E. Andrews. London: Hurst and Blackett, Ltd. 15s. net.)

This book, written by an American professor, is a queer composition, rather like Morocco itself in its mixture of the old and the new. It gives one almost a shock to find stuck among descriptions of century-old customs and translations of Berber poems reproductions of photographs. With the subject-matter these photographs, which, incidentally, are excellent, do not seem to accord; and yet the method adequately indicates its author, who obviously has achieved in his sojourn in Morocco no harmony between the old and the new.

His volume, which consists mainly of observations upon Marrakesh and upon a forbidden journey to the Souss, has a certain informative value. But we have too many observations and too few impressions. Constantly we are being told of the fascination and the impossibility of comprehending this outpost of the East; but this attitude of reverence and of helplessness before the spell of Morocco is hardly worth the serious student's attention. One feels that, with all his opportunities and the zest with which he seized them, Mr. Andrews ought to have penetrated more deeply into the soul, the life of the place; instead of which we have a series of superficial sketches, interesting enough for a magazine article, but scarcely deserving of being included in an expensive book. Yet he is a very cheery writer, with a sense of humour that drags one in his wake; so that one reaches the abrupt end with no sense of effort, if with little satisfaction. It is curious that he should have dedicated the book to Joseph Conrad, whose method of representing Eastern life is so different from this photographic method; and one does not see why the proofs, which show an occasional mixture of American and British spelling, should not have been more carefully supervised. If Mr. Andrews brings out another edition of his work, he should include a map, particularly of his route to the Souss, which might be of considerable importance to geographers and to students generally.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN.

"SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN AND THE INDIAN REFORM MOVEMENT." By S. K. Ratcliffe. (London: George Allen and Unwin, Ltd. 6s. net,

The author describes this memoir as "an impersonal record," and "almost entirely an account of the Indian Reform movement." It is therefore history rather than biography, but as history it suffers from being absolutely uncritical. It shows Wedderburn always in the right, and his opponents usually as prejudiced fools, or worse; it will, therefore, be welcomed by unthinking Nationalists, but ordinary readers will look in vain for an explanation of what they want chiefly to know—why this undoubtedly able man evoked such constant antagonism in responsible circles, and achieved so little in comparison with his expenditure of effort. Apart from these defects, the book is a tolerably adequate account of its subject.

THE LOTUS ISLANDS.

"ISLES OF ILLUSION." Edited by Bohun Lynch. (London: Constable and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

It is seldom that one can read a modern book of travel that is at once so fascinating and provocative as is this volume. Not only is the personality of the writer extraordinarily mordant, but the form of his writing is individual and, indeed, remarkable. Mr. Bohun Lynch has collected a series of letters written to him by a friend, whose identity he does not discover to us, during the years 1912 to 1920. This friend has been, before he went on his travels, in turn a medical student, a bank clerk, a teacher, and an undergraduate (with Mr. Lynch) at Oxford. Then he went away, teaching first in Cairo and afterwards in South America; finally he answered the call, which had long been dinning his ears, to the South Seas. It is from these South Sea islands that these strange and bitter letters are written.

We cannot, in this place, discuss the merits of the letter writer's views upon the islands, upon the natives, the settlers, the missionaries, and the rest. In any case, that would not be an easy matter, because with so sensitive an egoist as he, such views were continually changing. Periodically, he would let different elements in his constitution have their fling, roving freely between a remote kind of Englishness and a jocund paganism. All conceivable hardships on these islands he endured, and his achievements were not few. The ugliness and beauty of the places continually reacted upon him, and he was not slow frankly to record his impressions. He, or rather his editor, has produced a book distinctly worth reading.

Without suggesting that his views upon life in the South Seas are important, we can say that they are interesting. Sometimes they are wrong—he himself often confesses to that; but the trouble with so versatile an egoist is that he is never convinced, and consequently never convinces us, that he is right. It was, for example, perhaps natural, that from such a distance the War should have seemed to him only a madness; but his letters on this event are not only petty, but even regrettable. His experiences have been unusual, perhaps unique; but even more interesting than his description of them would have been the setting down of what they had taught him.

THE ORDER OF ST. JOHN OF JERUSALEM AND THE RED CROSS IN INDIA.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—If you regard the history of the progress of ambulance work, for both peace and war, in the Eastern Dominions of the British Crown as coming within your scope, allow me to expose in your columns the erroneous method in which the Press of India frames its reports on that subject. The latest and most flagrant example is due to Reuter. The annual meeting at Simla of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem and Red Cross has very recently taken place, the Earl of Reading presiding and Lord Rawlinson being present. The report of this meeting transmitted to the leading daily papers of London is headed "The Red Cross in India." Nothing could be more unjustly misleading. It was in 1901 that the Order of St. John of Jerusalem decided to start ambulance work in India, and commissioned me, who had drawn up and submitted the scheme, to undertake it. I commanded my regiment on the frontier from 1902 to 1905 and at the same time had the work of the St. John Ambulance Association in India in my hands. In March, 1905, I, under the age clause, vacated the command of my regiment, and at the same time handed over the ambulance work to a committee, of which Lord Kitchener consented to be the chairman. Lord Curzon accepted the post of president of the Indian branch. It was under Lord Curzon's auspices that I commenced my work in Calcutta in 1905. On July 10, 1910, Viscount Knutsford, Director of the Ambulance Department and Sub-Prior of the Order, made a statement in the House of Lords, and in the report of that Department for 1915-16 a very concise history of the foundation and progress of the Indian Branch is given. In 1914-15 war opened India to the Red Cross, and subsequently fusion between the work of the Order of St. John and the Red Cross took place.

Reuter's representatives are, very naturally, persons who know little or nothing about all this past history; and as the eight-pointed white cross of St. John is to the Red Cross very much as Joe Chamberlain's celebrated white orchid is to the red buttonholes of the Labour Party, in other words, as a quiet thing is to one that is nothing if not flaring, of course, the Press gives prominence to that which flares. Still, the eight-pointed cross asks that justice should be done to it. It was in 1910 or 1911 that I resigned my post of Honorary Organising Commissioner for India of the St. John A.A.

I am, etc.,
A. C. YATE.

[We are glad to give Colonel Yate an opportunity of recording the good work that he did in India in connection with the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, but it is only fair that it should be pointed out that neither Reuter's Agency nor the Press of India is responsible for the headlines in the London Press, and it is enough to see the ungainly heading at the top of his letter to realise why it is not likely to be repeated or to be copied by any other paper.—ED.]

NOTES AND NEWS.

Birthday Honours.

It cannot be said that the business world was neglected in the Birthday Honours List, which made a very belated appearance at the week-end. As a matter of fact, the distinctions bestowed on commerce form its outstanding feature. Notable among the awards are the baronetcies conferred on Sir W. Watson Rutherford, chairman of the Roumanian Consolidated Oilfields; Mr. J. H. B. Noble, a director of Messrs. Armstrong, Whitworth and Co.; Sir A. J. Dorman, managing director of Messrs. Dorman, Long and Co.; and Mr. G. A. Wills, chairman of the Imperial Tobacco Company; and the K.B.E. conferred on Mr. Arthur Balfour.

The Monsoon.

The monsoon has made a far from auspicious commencement, and considerable anxiety will be felt with regard to the outlook in India, for an indifferent rainfall might well have disastrous consequences. But it is too early to judge as yet as to the prospects for the monsoon. It has not infrequently happened that a monsoon that has opened badly has in the end given India all the rain required, and we must hope it will be so in the present case. Incidentally, it is not only in regard to India that agricultural conditions are at the present time giving cause for apprehension. In Europe generally the weather has been unfavourable for crops, and unless a very remarkable improvement takes place from now onwards, it is only too probable that the yield of cereals will be much below the normal, and if that happens, it will mean rising prices and a shortage for some regions. The Near East as a whole seems to be better situated than Europe, though in some districts there the farmers (who are proverbially pessimistic) talk gloomily of the coming harvest, though their view is fortunately not shared by other observers.

The Position in Roumania.

The report on conditions in Roumania in 1922 by Mr. Adams, Commercial Secretary to the British Legation at Bucharest, does not make encouraging reading. He states that little progress was made during the year in regard to economic reconstruction, while pointing out that certain hopeful signs were apparent. The transport system, which is all-important for the country's development, "continues to be in an unsatisfactory condition," is his verdict, while "the permanent way seems to be rather worse than at the end of 1921"; also, in his view, it is impossible to foresee how many years it will take for Roumania to adjust her adverse trade balance. In reviewing the position in Roumania, it is necessary to take into the fullest consideration the extraordinary nature of the problem with which the Government has been faced as a result of the country's disastrous experience during the War. It is true that the solution of the problem has not been facilitated by some of the measures that have been carried out; but the mistakes of the past have served the purpose of illuminating the path along which Roumania has to travel, and the present Administration has made it evident that its policy is framed on very deliberate lines, and time must be given it to prove the practical value of the policy.

By Car to Baghdad.

It is interesting to note that no time has been lost in taking advantage of the motor-car service to be inaugurated between Haifa and Baghdad next October. On October 27 it is proposed to carry out from London a seven-weeks' tour, which will include visits to Cairo, Luxor, the Valley of the Kings, where further operations in the tomb of Tutankhamen will be in progress, thence to Jerusalem, where the Palestine Exploration Fund will be carrying out, under Prof. R. A. S. Macalister, excavations on the site of the City of David. Included in the Palestine tour will be visits to Nazareth, Tiberias, Haifa, thence to Beyrout, with an excursion to Baalbek. After a stay at Damascus, a trip across the Syrian desert will be undertaken to Baghdad. From the latter town it is hoped that it will be possible to extend the tour to Babylon and to Ur of the Chaldees, where the excavations on the site of Nebuchadnezzar's palace will have been resumed. The tour is to be under the personal supervision of Captain F. W. Chardin, formerly Political Officer at Mosul, of the Overseas Bureau for Travel, who speaks, in addition to other languages, Arabic, Turkish, and Persian. A tour of this nature, apart from its general interest, should afford an opportunity for a rapid survey of commercial conditions and business openings in the countries visited.

State v. Company Management.

In his speech at the general meeting of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Sir Charles Armstrong touched on the question of State or company management of the railways in connection with the future of the two railways, whose contracts will shortly expire, and emphasised the unanimity of the leading industrialists in Bombay with whom he discussed the question against anything in the nature of State management. The view is held in Bombay that company management is essential for sound and economical working, and that competition is desirable in the interests of trade and industrial development. In view of all the experiences we have had of the disadvantages and drawbacks of State interference in commerce, it is not surprising that this attitude should be taken.

British Consular Reports.

IV.—ROUMANIA.

The following extracts are taken from the report of the Commercial Secretary to the British Legation, Bucharest. Mr. Alexander Adams, on economic conditions in Roumania in 1922 :—

During the year 1922 it cannot be said that, on the whole, much progress has been made in the economic rehabilitation of Roumania, but indications are not lacking that serious efforts were made in that direction. The more hopeful signs which were apparent were as follows :—First, certain real economies were effected in the public administration by the Minister of Finance; secondly, direct taxation was unified throughout the whole country by means of a law which recently passed through Parliament; and, thirdly, the process of handing over land taken from big estates all over the country continued steadily.

On the other hand, it is still too early to say that these tendencies have yet had much result, judging from the following facts :—In the early part of 1922 the Roumanian Government brought in fresh Budget estimates which amount to approximately 10,498,000 lei for annual expenditure. Since that date, however, both the international and the internal value of the leu has decreased. The outstanding financial measure of the year was the conversion of the external floating debt charge (consisting of Roumanian Treasury Bills to the amount of about £35,000,000 sterling, into 4 per cent. consolidated bonds). This conversion was accompanied by an issue of a small priority loan also at 4 per cent. for a nominal £4,500,000. The services of both of these loans was secured by a first charge on the existing export taxes in force on products leaving Roumania. These export taxes are levied in foreign currencies and remittances are made each month, direct from the sums received by the Banca Nationala to the British issuing houses to provide payments for interest and sinking fund. As a second security the State Revenues are pledged. The amount of paper money in circulation also increased during 1922, though a portion of this increase may be regarded as being legitimately, though not proportionately, covered by greater amounts of gold coins received by the Banca Nationala.

Unfortunately, the transport system, both land and water, continues to be in an unsatisfactory condition. The permanent way seems to be rather worse than at the end of 1921, and railway accidents have been more frequent. During the period under review exports of grain have considerably decreased and loads of timber have slightly increased. The autumn sowings of 1922 were less than those made in the autumn of the preceding year.

The net results of these factors is that the trade balance remains against Roumania, and it is impossible to foresee how many years it will take for her to adjust this adverse balance. It is obvious that the prior conditions of such an adjustment are the reorganisation of her taxation in order that revenues may cover expenditure, and the reconstruction of her transport system. In these circumstances the general recommendation contained in the last two annual reports, that credits should not be granted to Roumanian importers, should continue to be borne in mind. It will be seen that the situation in Roumania continues to be unsatisfactory, notwithstanding efforts in some directions to put the finances of the country into order. The position has been full of difficulty for the Roumanian Government and people during the last few years.

Agriculture.

Since the leu commenced to depreciate it has apparently been thought possible to devise means whereby the Government could encash or utilise the difference between internal and world prices to lower the cost of living. On each occasion when the leu has been temporarily stabilised the prices of commodities have approximated the world level, so that it might now be obvious that this belief in an artificial control of prices is ill-founded, notwithstanding which efforts are continued in a variety of methods which do not succeed in attaining their object. In one case it is the imposition of heavy import taxes, in another the restriction of export to a certain quantity dependent upon other quantities handed over to home consumption, or upon production; in others both methods are applied. The adverse result of this policy and of the land reform measures is seen to-day in their effect on agriculture, when the fourth harvest gathered in since the Armistice is still about 3,000,000 tons short of the pre-war average.

The conversion of great estates into small peasant holdings was bound to affect the wheat sowings unfavourably, but some compensation might have been found in the increased effort with which the peasant would have cultivated his own land, had he not been discouraged into following a waiting policy by a series of measures passed by successive Governments which have restricted production.

The prolonged rains which did much damage to the maize also hampered the autumn ploughing for wheat, rye, and barley. The autumn sowings for wheat are less than half the pre-war average. Until the spring sowings have taken place it is impossible to forecast to what extent this limitation of the area sown in wheat will persist. Barley and oats are bringing more than the official fixed price of wheat, and although this fixed prices does not appear to rule all contracts, yet it may be taken that a good deal of the available crop changes hands at prices approximating thereto. Landowners are slowly abandoning the cultivation of wheat, a crop in which many of them took great pride, and for which they evinced a predilection as being essentially a landowner's crop in contradistinction to maize, which was grown by peasants.

EMPIRE COTTON GROWING CORPORATION

Report of Executive Committee.

At a recent meeting of the Administrative Council of the Empire Cotton Growing Corporation, the report of the Executive Committee for the three months ended May 31 was submitted. We give the following extracts from the report :—

The Levy.

During the months of March, April and May the sum collected on account of the levy amounts to £9,459 7s. 0d., making with interest a total of £82,859 11s. 0d. since collection started on September 1, 1921. Pending the passing of the Levy Bill part of this sum has been invested in Treasury Bonds, whilst the balance remains on deposit at the bank. The Committee are glad to be able to report that the Cotton Industry Bill, which provides for the collection of the levy from all spinners, passed through its Committee stage in the House of Commons on May 16. In view of the pledge given by the Government that facilities for the Bill would be provided, if necessary, there is every reason to believe that its passage into law this Session is practically assured.

India.

The Bill to impose a cess of 4 annas a bale on all raw cotton used by Indian mills or exported, by means of which funds will be provided for the Indian Central Cotton Committee, has passed into law, and the Committee have thus been placed in a position to commence work on the important programme they have outlined.

A Sub-Committee of the Corporation has been appointed to deal with questions relating to India. The following gentlemen have kindly expressed their willingness to serve on the committee :— Mr. J. H. Coney, Mr. H. R. C. Hailey, Mr G. F. Keatinge and Sir Marshall Reid, in addition to the following members of the Council :—Mr. W. H. Brady, Mr. W. H. Himbury, Mr. F. Hodgkinson, Mr. H. A. F. Lindsay, Mr. O. Marshall, Mr. W. R. W. Shand, Mr. F. A. Tomlinson and Mr. E. J. Turner.

Research and Training.

The Executive Committee have given careful consideration to an important recommendation made by the Research and Training Sub-Committee on the facilities at present existing for giving instruction in this country in those scientific subjects of use to cotton growers, and the necessity of expanding them. The Committee have not only urged that the facilities should be increased for training men for work in cotton-growing countries, but have pointed to the need for providing also means whereby those men who have gone abroad for this purpose may be able to refer to experts at home scientific problems for the solution of which they have neither the time nor perhaps the specialised knowledge. With a view to forming such a group of specialists, the Executive Committee have decided to offer retaining grants to certain universities where specialist work is already going on, and where, for a comparatively small additional sum, it might be possible to devote a well-qualified assistant exclusively to those aspects of the subject likely to be helpful either in the training of men to take up agricultural work on cotton or in the solution of such problems as may be referred to the Corporation by the Cotton Specialist abroad or on study leave. It has accordingly been decided to offer the sum of £1,000 a year for five years to each of the following institutions :—The School of Agriculture of the University of Cambridge for Plant Genetics; the Imperial College of Science and Technology for Plant Physiology and Pathology; the University of Manchester for Mycology and Entomology; the Soil Physics Department of the Rothamsted Experimental Station for Soil Physics.

So far as the grant permits, the Corporation expect from an institution accepting a grant that :—(1) It should devote the grant to the investigation of such branches of the special subject or subjects for which the grant is given as are known to be or are likely to prove of importance to cultivators of cotton, by an assistant delegated especially for this purpose. (2) It should receive holders of the Corporation's studentships and assistants on study leave without charge, and provide them with the necessary appliances for their work. (3) It should deal as far as it can with enquiries from scientific advisers to cotton-growing countries as to the methods that should be adopted, or the principles on which an investigation should be conducted, and for this purpose it should have available such publications as are likely to give the required information.

The Committee have also set aside the sum of £2,000 to aid definite pieces of research at institutions either in this country or overseas, and to provide for contingencies at the institutions named above. It is thought that this sum will suffice to meet the needs of the next few years.

It is hoped that the adoption of the scheme outlined above will bring scientific advisers in cotton-growing countries into direct touch with work that is being done at the Universities, in subjects in which they may require assistance, while close co-operation between the Corporation and the British Cotton Industry Research Association is already assured.

British Empire Exhibition.

The Cotton Textile Industry Committee hope shortly to summon a meeting of all the exhibitors in the Cotton Section of the Exhibition, when various points of detail will be settled. After this meeting has been held the Exhibition Sub-Committee of the Corporation expect to be in a position to draw up their plans for the joint exhibit with the British Cotton Growing Association and the Liverpool and Manchester Cotton Associations. A letter has been sent to the Governments and Directors of Agriculture of the various cotton-growing Colonies and Protectorates informing them that the Corporation propose to stage an exhibit, and asking them whether they will assist in providing samples.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Firmer Tone in Futures.

The Commercial Company of Egypt in their report for the week ended June 22 state :—

Since our last report, the futures market has been in general firmer, and with the exception of June and August Ashmouni prices at the close are slightly higher. The better tone displayed in our market can be attributed to the fact that the cheapness of our cotton compared to American has finally attracted the attention of spinners, and resulted in a fair amount of business being put through. Another cause is that the stocks are steadily decreasing, and the remaining cotton is held by people who appear to be financially independent, and decided not to part with it before a higher level of prices is attained. As soon as the closing of old straddles of Sakellaridis against Ashmouni had been completed June Ashmouni lost its strength, and has been again quoted at about $1 cheaper than July Sakellaridis. The Egyptian market in Liverpool has only fluctuated slightly, although one would be entitled to expect greater activity in view of the recent extraordinarily large daily spot sales. Stocks there are, however, also decreasing steadily, and that factor can but exercise eventually its influence on the course of prices. This week's receipts amounted to 8,405 krs., and the total since September 1 stands now at 6,608,229 krs. Exports have amounted to 42,449 krs., and the stock now stands at 1,380,576 krs., against 1,414,620 krs. a week ago and 1,883,481 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—We have had a fair week at Minet-el-Bassal. Sales amount to about 5,700 bales, of which we estimate 4,500 B/s. Sakellaridis, 1,200 Uppers and a few bales of Brown and White. Arrivals are more than last week, but very small, and the stock shows a further decrease.

Sakellaridis.—All styles have been dealt in. Prices of spot against contracts are without much change, but inclined to harden for grades below fully good fair, which are scarce and in good demand.

Uppers have been rather neglected, which is but to be expected at their present high rates in comparison with Sakel, which naturally attracts buyers to the latter growth. Most of the business has been in Fully Good Fair and above, though all styles have been dealt in. Except Fully Good, which is rather dearer, there is very little change from last week's rates.

Brown and White.—A retail trade has been done at unchanged rates for Brown, and at a slightly easier basis for White. Supplies are very small.

Crop 1923.—Latest news on the crop continues good. There is nothing special to report.

The Liverpool Report and the Cotton Trade Review will be found on page 24. Owing to pressure on our space, the usual reports on Near East markets and stocks and shares are omitted this week.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS

The following extracts are taken from recent reports received by the Imperial Ottoman Bank :—

Cyprus, June 2.

The market is very dull. The prospects of the coming crop are good.

June 9.

There is a slightly better tone in the market. Small sales of wool and maize seed have taken place in Marseilles. There is a noticeable decrease in imports, particularly from Germany.

Adana, May 31.

The sowing of cotton seed was finished here on May 15. The climatic conditions at present ruling being very favourable to the growing of cotton and a large area being sown this year, there should be an abundant harvest, which is estimated at about 70,000 bales, as we predicted in our previous report. Cereals, which suffered severely this year from the heavy rains which fell in February and March, are considered only of medium quality. It is not generally believed that this year's crop, after supplying local needs, will provide a large surplus. The harvest is nearly finished. Barley has already appeared on the market and will soon be followed by wheat.

Djihan.—The cereal harvest is being actively pursued. The tobacco production has this year been particularly encouraged by the purchases made by certain merchants from Constantinople. An area of 20,000 dunums of land has been sown, as against only 3,400 dunums last year.

Adana.—From a commercial point of view, our market during the present month has transacted no business worthy of mention. 120 bales of cotton were, however, exported, and 5/600 bales of unwashed wool.

ORIENTAL TELEPHONE AND ELECTRIC COMPANY.

The report of the Oriental Telephone and Electric Co., Ltd., for the year ended December 31. states that the business both of this company and of the associated companies has continued to expand. At December 31 the Oriental Telephone Co. had a total of 10,738 stations, an increase of 675 during the year. The gross revenue of the company's branches shows a satisfactory increase, but owing to the growth in expenses and charges the net revenue is but little in excess of that in the previous year. In the last annual report it was stated that the Government of India had granted to this company and the associated companies security of tenure for a period of twenty years from March, 1923, the Government having abandoned the right which they previously possessed of purchasing the undertakings at recurring intervals during that period. The companies have in return undertaken to carry out extensive works necessary for modernising and improving the service generally, and increases have been sanctioned in the rates of subscription payable in order to meet the higher costs of working. All the supplemental agreements embodying these terms have been signed. In accordance with the terms of the supplemental agreements the company has transferred, or is about to transfer, its undertakings in Madras and Rangoon-Moulmein, to local Indian companies, the purchase consideration in each case being fully paid shares in the new companies.

The annual general meeting of the Imperial Ottoman Bank will be held at Winchester House, E.C., on July 25.

The directors of the Adriatic Bank have decided henceforward to use only the Yugoslav name of that institution, "Jadranska Banka "

SHIPPING AT GALATZ IN 1922.

River traffic has been very slack during the past year, there having been no grain worth mentioning loaded at up-river ports for transport to overseas shipping centres (says the British Vice-Consul at Galatz, Mr. L. H. Hughes-Hallett, in his annual report). Grain shippers are now adopting the practice of loading barley and oats at Lower Danube ports into lighters for winter depots at Sulina, and are arranging to have floating elevators at their disposal at that port for transhipment purposes. In present circumstances the export from these depots cannot be expected to attain an appreciable quantity. The reduced export was detrimental to sea and river navigation, as, through lack of freight, many vessels have been idle, waiting for a better crop, and thus incurring unnecessary expenditure.

The town of Galatz had a pre-war population of 70,000-80,000, and at present between 240,000 and 300,000, and this has necessitated the building of an additional 2,000 buildings in this one town alone during the past year. The cost of labour and material is very heavy, and shows no sign of reduction. Building operations progress slowly, owing to the scarcity of labour, and to the fact that there is insufficient currency. Rents are exorbitant, and are likely to remain so until housing accommodation becomes more plentiful.

The close of the season 1922 sees the near completion of much-needed improvements, for during the summer and autumn the dock engineers have erected at Galatz two large new receiving sheds of galvanised iron, with a cargo capacity of about 3,000 tons each. In addition, there have been installed four new electrical cranes with a lifting capacity of 3 tons each, and one new electrical crane with a lifting capacity of 40 tons.

Similarly one new receiving shed, together with two new electrical cranes, have been erected at Braila. The whole of this material was supplied by British firms. It is to be expected, therefore, that the annual congestion of cargo, which has been a feature of the docks at Galatz for some years, will be avoided in the future. With the means now available it is possible to discharge daily about 2,700 tons of general cargo from vessels.

During the year 1922, 78 British vessels with a total tonnage of 120,957 entered this port, and 65 British vessels with a total tonnage of 100,390 cleared, compared with 97 with a tonnage of 180,940 which entered, and 38 with a tonnage of 66,583 which cleared during the year 1921. These figures support the statement that imports during the year under review have fallen off slightly, for the reasons stated earlier in this report. There is an increase in the number of British vessels which cleared from this port, compared with 1921, amounting to 27. With regard to shipping of other nationalities, statistics are not yet to hand, but the following are the totals of vessels which entered and cleared from the Danube (Port of Sulina) during 1922:—Entered, 521; tonnage, 768,027; cleared, 523; tonnage, 805,316.

Company Meetings.

MORTGAGE COMPANY OF EGYPT.

Economic Situation of the Country.

The fifteenth ordinary general meeting of the Mortgage Company of Egypt, Ltd., was held on June 28, at Cannon Street Hotel, E.C.

Sir Henry Babington Smith, G.B.E., K.C.B., C.S.I. (Chairman of the London Committee), presided.

The Secretary (Mr. S. R. Duncan) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman moved the adoption of the report and accounts, and in the course of his remarks, said: Gentlemen,—The new Constitution of Egypt was finally approved and promulgated by King Fuad and his Ministers in April last. Regarding the effect of this change of political status on the business of the company, all that it is necessary to say is that there has been no prejudicial effect upon the normal and friendly relations between the company and its clients, and no disturbance of the operation of the law, where it has been necessary to go to the Courts.

The Price of Cotton.

After the violent fluctuations of recent years the price of cotton has remained fairly steady, at 30 to 35 talaris per kantar in Alexandria. At the present price the results to the cultivator should be fairly satisfactory. This is confirmed by the fact that agricultural clients of the Mortgage Company, whose properties are carefully administered, have, in general, met their engagements without difficulty. The clients who have experienced difficulty have usually been those whose principal occupation is unconnected with farming.

In other respects the economic condition of the country is satisfactory. The adverse balance of trade which was shown by the figures for imports and exports in the year September 1, 1920, to August 31, 1921, has been corrected. There is also evidence that large sums have been invested by Egyptians in the purchase of Egyptian securities, and that there is, in consequence, a large increase in the amount of the Egyptian public debt which is held in Egypt. It seems probable that more than half of the debt is now held by residents in Egypt.

The Balance Sheet.

I will now ask you to look at the balance-sheet. The total reserves, together with the profit on sales in suspense, now amount to £393,198, and will be increased to over £427,000 by the allocation to special reserve which we propose.

There is again a small increase in the instalments in arrear, which now stand in the balance-sheet at £369,000, compared with £352,000 last year. On May 31 this outstanding balance had been reduced to £335,000. In nearly all cases the security held fully covers the amount of the debt, and, as stated in the report, it is considered that any doubtful cases are amply provided for by the reserves that have been made for this purpose. I may mention that the security for each loan is periodically revalued, in order that, where necessary, measures of protection may be taken.

The amount of new business offering has been somewhat less than in the preceding years. The Board has continued to follow a policy of very careful scrutiny and selection, and has only entertained applications for loans upon lands or buildings which offered unimpeachable security. The amount of the new loans actually granted was £389,000, as against £558,000 in the year 1921-22. The total amount invested in mortgages is now £3,001,441, compared with £3,122,024 last year.

The Control in Egypt.

Throughout the past year the affairs of the company have been controlled, managed, and conducted by the board of directors in Egypt in accordance with the new arrangement adopted in March, 1922. As a result, the company is no longer subject to British income-tax upon its profits, except in so far as those profits are brought to this country for distribution to shareholders here. The reduction of expenditure under this head is about £14,000, with the result that the balance of profit carried to the balance-sheet, after providing for debenture interest and preference share dividend, and also for the compensation paid to directors who retired, is £64,105, as against £46,354 last year. This enables the Board to recommend an allocation of £34,726 to the special reserve, in place of £15,000. In this connection I venture to recall a statement I made at the extraordinary general meeting on March 16, 1922. "In future," I said, "if all profits except those distributed in the United Kingdom are free from income-tax the sums placed to reserve can be largely increased without affecting the sums distributed to the Ordinary shareholders. This will, of course, tend to strengthen the reserves, which are a protection to the Preference shareholder." It is satisfactory to find that this anticipation is now being realised. The shareholders are greatly indebted to the Board in Egypt, and in particular to Harari Pasha, the Chairman, for the constant care and close attention which they have given to the business of the company.

Colonel the Hon. Sidney Peel, D.S.O., seconded the resolution, which was unanimously adopted, and a dividend of 12 per cent. was declared.

EGYPTIAN HOTELS.

Details of Proposed Amalgamation.

The twenty-sixth annual general meeting of the Egyptian Hotels, Ltd., was held on June 29, at the offices of the company, 11, Ironmonger Lane, E.C., the Right Hon. Lord Claud Hamilton, P.C., Chairman of the company, presiding.

The notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors having been read,

The Chairman said: You will no doubt, as usual, take the directors' report and accounts as read.

The profits of the hotels are shown at £47,374, which, it will be observed, includes £5,000, being part of the profits of Semiramis Hotel. Last year we did not bring into our accounts any of the profits earned by Semiramis. The profit at Shepheard's Hotel this year is £42,374, as compared with £52,852 for the year ended April 30, 1922, a decrease of some £10,500. This decrease in profits is mainly due to the slack summer in 1922. In the latter part of the season, however, the discoveries at Luxor attracted a very large number of visitors to Cairo, with consequent benefit to your company.

As you are aware, your company has for many years been the principal shareholder in the Semiramis Hotel, and has also made considerable advances to that company. When addressing you last year I mentioned that the Semiramis Hotel had had a very successful year, and I am pleased to be able to report that for the year ended April 30 last the accounts of the Semiramis show even more successful results than for the year to April 30, 1922. Your directors, therefore, feel fully justified in bringing back into our profits a sum of £5,000, which is only a portion of the profits of the Semiramis Hotel for last year, and is considerably less than the amounts we have provided in past years to write down the book value of our investments in and advances to that hotel.

The Balance Sheet.

Turning to the balance-sheet, you will observe that the value of our freehold and leasehold land and buildings this year appears at the sum of £55,038 10s. 4d., and that the suspense account for land sales has now disappeared from the balance-sheet, the amount representing the sale of land not conveyed to the purchaser having been deducted from the figures of freehold and leasehold land and buildings. We are able to do this because the land sales contract has now been completed, except that we are still liable to convey the remainder of the land to the purchaser when called upon to do so.

During the year there have been further additions to plant, fixtures and furniture, amounting to £12,528 14s. 6d.

In the main, this is the expenditure which I foreshadowed when addressing you last year, the money having been laid out chiefly in the provision of private bathrooms—an expenditure which the managing director reports has proved very remunerative.

The other items in the balance-sheet which show any considerable change as compared with last year are those in connection with our interests in the Société Suisse Egyptienne des Hotels, which owns the Semiramis Hotel. As is stated on the balance-sheet, your company now owns the entire share capital of the Société Suisse Egyptienne des Hotels and has also acquired the whole of the Second Mortgage Debentures of that company, which were previously held as collateral security for a loan which had been guaranteed by your company. We are therefore in the position as regards the Société Suisse Egyptienne des Hotels that we hold the whole of the Second Mortgage Debentures and the whole of the share capital, and are practically the sole creditors, except that there is a charge on the assets of the company for approximately £50,000 by way of First Debentures, in which we also have a substantial holding. Excluding our interest in these First Debentures, the value of our interest in Semiramis stands in the balance-sheet at £48,888, a conservative figure in view of the results shown by that hotel for the last two years.

Financial Position.

Our financial position is a good one. Investments in Egyptian Government securities are of the same nominal value as last year, and stand in the balance-sheet at cost price, £39,101 6s. 2d. Their market value at the date of the balance-sheet was £44,000. Cash, £82,620 11s. 7d., is some £16,000 less than last year, the decrease being due to the expenditure of £20,000 already referred to in acquiring the Second Mortgage Debentures of the Semiramis Hotel.

The undistributed balance of our profit and loss account is £51,333 4s. 4d., and our special reserve account stands at £35,000, showing a total of undistributed profits of £86,336 4s. 4d.

The Proposed Amalgamation.

In the directors' report which has been circulated it will be observed that reference is made to a proposed amalgamation of the undertaking of this company with that of the Société des Grands Hotels d'Egypte. Although the time has not arrived for the shareholders to be asked to pass any resolution on this subject, you will no doubt expect that I should give some details of the proposed scheme. The Société des Grands Hotels d'Egypte, as you are probably aware, owns the Continental and other hotels in Egypt, and, as stated in the directors' report, that company have recently acquired a substantial holding in the Ordinary shares of Egyptian Hotels, Ltd., and are now, I believe, the principal shareholders. It is their desire that there should be a more complete amalgamation of the interests of the two companies, which would have the effect of bringing under one control all the principal hotels in Cairo, and should make for more economical working and better results generally. The Société des Grands Hotels has a share capital of £148,000, divided into 37,000 fully-paid shares of £4 each. The balance-sheet of April 30, 1922, shows reserve accounts amounting to £119,078. The profits of the hotels, as shown by the accounts for the year ended April 30, 1922, are £64,065, against which have been charged costs of general administration, £5,639, interest and amortisation of Debentures, £20,537, and depreciation, £16,609. The balance of profits for the year, after meeting these charges, is £21,280, making with the balance of undistributed balance of profits brought forward, £31,456, out of which was paid a dividend of 50 piastres per share, equivalent to 12¾ per cent. per annum. The shares have recently been quoted locally at £12 10s. per share, so that on the proposed terms of one share in the Société des Grands Hotels for three fully-paid Ordinary shares of £1 each in Egyptian Hotels, Ltd., there is a slight advantage on market quotations in favour of the Ordinary shareholders in this company, our shares having recently been quoted at £3 12s. 6d. per share.

Rights of Preference Shareholders.

The terms proposed fully protect the rights of our Preference shareholders. They will be entitled, if the scheme goes through, to have in exchange for their shares Five per Cent. Debentures in Grands Hotels to the nominal value of their Preference share holdings in Egyptian Hotels. These Debentures will be redeemable at 105 by means of a sinking fund. Alternatively the Preference shareholders may be paid out in cash at par.

Under the terms of a conditional agreement which has been entered into, the undertaking of Egyptian Hotels, Ltd., is to be acquired by the Société des Grands Hotels as from May 1 last, and it is a condition of that agreement that we are to be at liberty to declare the dividends recommended by the directors in the report now before you.

The conditional agreement has already been accepted by the shareholders of the Grands Hotels Company. Under the provision of the Companies Acts it has now to be submitted for sanction to the Court, and, if the Court approves, meetings of the shareholders of our company must be summoned to decide whether or not the scheme of amalgamation shall be confirmed. At these meetings full particulars of the conditional agreement will be submitted.

I now beg to move: "That the directors' report and accounts for the year to April 30, 1923, as submitted to the shareholders, be received and adopted."

Mr. Charles Baehler seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

On the proposal of the Chairman, seconded by Mr. H. M. Snow, M.V.O., a dividend of 5 per cent. on the Preference shares was declared, and on the proposal of the Chairman, seconded by Mr. Baehler, a dividend of 30 per cent. on the Ordinary shares was declared.

Sir W. B. Peat proposed the re-election of the Right Hon. Lord Claud Hamilton, P.C., as a director. He said that as it was not improbable that this was the last occasion on which he or anyone else would have the opportunity of proposing the re-election of any member of the board, and he wished to bear testimony to the services of the Chairman, who had been on the Board since the inception of the company and had helped to build up the splendid position in which the company found itself. He hoped that, after the amalgamation, should it become effective, there would be a still more successful future for the hotels.

Mr. Baehler seconded the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

Messrs. Turquand, Youngs and Co. were reappointed auditors, and the meeting ended with a vote of thanks to the Chairman.

GREAT INDIAN PENINSULA RAILWAY.

The hundred and forty-seventh half-yearly general meeting of the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company was held on June 29 at the company's offices, 48, Copthall Avenue, E.C. Sir Charles H. Armstrong (chairman of the company) presided.

The Secretary (Mr. R. H. Walpole) having read the notice convening the meeting,

The Chairman said that when he addressed them a year ago, he had to report a deficit on the year's working of 240 lakhs, which was due mainly to increased cost of coal and an all-round increase in working expenses. During the past year the position had improved, but there was still a small deficit of 8.20 lakhs, and consequently there were no surplus profits to divide. The guaranteed interest for the half-year of 1½ per cent. was being paid as usual, together with a dividend of ⅜ per cent. which they were able to make from a small fund they had in hand. The return for the year was, therefore, 3⅜ per cent. Although rates and fares were raised at the beginning of the year, traffics on the whole had been disappointing. There had been a decrease in the number of passengers carried, and also some falling off in the tonnage of goods, but receipts generally were higher owing to the increased rates and fares, which were necessary to cover the greatly increased cost of working. There were special circumstances in 1921-22 to account for the large deficit of 240 lakhs, but increased working expenses remained, and, so far as he could see, were likely to continue. It was necessary, therefore, to reduce working costs wherever possible, and it was with this object in view that he went out to India last November on a three months' inspection. In connection with working expenses, he might mention that they had inaugurated a transportation department, that was to say, they had withdrawn the transportation elements from the traffic and locomotive departments and combined them in one department, whose function was to push the traffic through efficiently and expeditiously. That scheme took some time to work out, and was only in its initial stage when he was in India, but he saw enough to convince him that it would be a great help in the movement of traffic and cause a substantial saving in expenditure.

The future of the two Indian railways whose contracts were shortly expiring was an interesting topic during his tour in India. He discussed the question with leading industrialists in Bombay, and was surprised at the unanimity with which they objected to anything in the way of State management, which, by the way, was being discarded first by one country and then by another on the ground of its extravagance and inefficiency. Italy and Austria, so far as he could see, were the latest converts and, although the circumstances were no doubt exceptional, Germany might quite possibly follow suit, for at the present time there were enormous deficits on the working of the German State railways and a great drain consequently on the National Exchequer. The view held in Bombay was that company management was essential for sound and economical working, and that competition, even though it might be slight, was desirable in the interests of trade and industrial development. For some time a satisfactory and businesslike solution of this question had been sought, but it had not yet been found. So far as this railway was concerned, it would, he imagined, be impossible to float it as an Indian company on terms which would be satisfactory to the Secretary of State as the predominant partner. The G.I.P. Railway was, however, a fine property, and as a great deal of money had been spent on it during the past twenty-three years it had great potential possibilities, and he felt certain that handsome profits would be earned. That being so, the possibility of forming an Indian company on satisfactory terms was by no means remote. Meantime, whatever changes were made to meet the needs of the day they should be carried out with as little disturbance as possible to existing conditions, so that eventually the line might pass from one management to another without friction, interruption of policy, loss of efficiency, or discontent and uncertainty of staff, and uncertainty as to the future was in everyone's mind during his recent tour in India.

Prospects for the current year were, he regretted to say, not altogether favourable, as traffic returns were disappointing, and until trade revived he did not think there was much chance of increased receipts. The monsoon had started quietly.

The report was unanimously adopted.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Good Inquiry and Fair Business.

Messrs Reynolds and Gibson report as follows under date June 27:—

The inquiry for spot Egyptian has again been good, and a very fair business has resulted. As compared with the series of fluctuating "futures" markets which we have lately witnessed, the period now under review has been one of comparative calm, and spot cotton has had an opportunity of finding its own level, the net result of which has been that the basis of Sakellaridis has hardened slightly, whilst that of Uppers has shown a corresponding decline. Ten days ago the selection of Uppers was becoming extremely limited in character, and there seemed every prospect that spinners would have to pay 17.00d. or over for F.G.F. to Good Uppers before very long. Generally speaking, however, spinners declined to follow the advance, and rather more cotton appearing on offer than was expected, the usual weak sellers appeared with the inevitable result. It is unlikely, however, that Uppers will lose much ground; indeed, it is more probable that they will recover what little they have lost, as there are still four months before the new crop can make its presence felt.

In Sakellaridis the customary mopping-up process continues steadily, the bulk of the cotton purchased being, as heretofore, Good Fair to Strict Fully Good Fair, and prices paid have varied from 15½d.-16¼d. Over the latter price the inquiry continued to be of fair dimensions, but actual business has been limited. A small business has been done in the finer grades, the top price paid during the week being 19.50d. Low cotton 12d.-14d. has continued to be in fair request; Brown and White cottons have been comparatively neglected, but rather a better trade has taken place in Sudan cotton, the white variety being chiefly wanted at about 100-150 on contracts.

C.i.f. business showed some improvement at the beginning of the week, but during the last day or two it fell back again into its previous state of stagnation. Crop news to hand has been distinctly favourable to the plant, and the backwardness previously reported in the Delta has been practically made up again during the past month. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 22nd inst. were returned as 5,702 bales. Quotations of Brown and Upper show a rise of 5 points on the week. Sakellaridis has been advanced 20 points all round. Sales, 4,500 bales (includes 810 bales Sudan). F.G.F. Sakellaridis to-day 16.20d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

No Improvement in Conditions.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended June 30 states:—

Unfortunately, no improvement can be reported in the trade conditions which have prevailed during the past few days. Buyers, whether of cloth or yarn, continue to restrict their operations to what may be termed "hand-to-mouth" buying. The Federation of Master Cotton Spinners is recommending a continued curtailment of 50 per cent. of production of yarns spun from American cotton until the end of August, exclusive of holidays, but the number of those who have confidence in remedial measures of this character is becoming smaller and smaller.

Yarn.—The turnover in this section shows no signs of increasing, and it is coming to be recognised that the "minimum price" scheme is a failure, as sellers are to be found prepared to accept as much as 1d. and 1½d. per lb. less than the basic prices. As has been the case for so long spinners of Egyptian qualities are in a better position than those using the American staple.

Cloth.—The week started with a slightly better feeling owing to an increased inquiry, which, however, proved short-lived. As usual, manufacturers cannot in the majority of cases quote prices within the reach of overseas buyers. Here and there fair-sized lines are reported to have been booked for China, mainly in fancy goods, but the volume of business being placed for India is still very disappointing. Other overseas markets call for no comment, and under the influence of depressing weather the home trade inquiry remains negligible.

Raw Cotton.—The raw cotton market has been more subdued, and fluctuations have been within narrower limits. The "spot" demand is still small, but a fair turnover is reported in Egyptian qualities, much of which is said to be for export. Closing prices are as follows: American fully middling, 16.67; Egyptian fully good fair, 16.20.

The traffic receipts of the Suez Canal Company for the period June 16 to June 22 amounted to 2,990,000 francs, as against 2,620,000 francs.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Lausanne : The End in Sight.

The report that all outstanding questions between Greece and Turkey had been settled at Lausanne last Friday, and had been included in a definite agreement, prepared public opinion for the subsequent announcement on Monday morning that a settlement had been reached by the Allied Powers and Turkey on the questions of the debt and the evacuation of Constantinople. The ground has thus been cleared for the signature of the Peace Treaty, which it is expected will take place early next week. On the question of the currency in which coupons of the Ottoman Debt are to be paid a compromise has been effected by omitting the subject from the Treaty. The Allies waive their claim for a Turkish declaration recognising the validity of the Decree of Moharrem, and for their own part maintain their contention that the private contracts remain in force and cannot be modified except by agreement between the Turkish Government and the bondholders. For Turkey no less than for the Allies it is a good thing to have peace in sight. For some little time to come the crux of the position in the Near and Middle East will be not so much the wording of the Treaty as the spirit in which the Turkish Government of the day sets about its ordinary work and tries to regulate its diplomatic relations. At the moment the Turkish authorities in Angora, whether holding official rank or pulling the strings to which official puppets respond, have absorbed too much Soviet doctrine into their system to be able to think or to see clearly. They may be showing a tendency to turn against those who have gained a subtle mastery over them, but the poison has done its work for the present, and probably a few violent shocks will have to be experienced before it is wholly eradicated.

Passports in Turkey.

While sympathy will be felt for the unfortunate victims of Turkish administrative vagaries, it is not altogether a bad thing that examples of Angora's ineptitude should be multiplied while the Lausanne Conference is still sitting. Certainly, if ridicule could kill a Government, the Angora experiment would have come to an end some time ago, and the seat of Government of Turkey would be in Constantinople, where at least there are buildings adapted for the transaction of official business, and possibly a sufficient number of trained officials available for the transaction of routine business. There will naturally be no question of transferring the Government to Constantinople while the latter city is in Allied occupation; but it is to be hoped that the drawbacks of the Anatolian town and the administrative blunders connected with its name will compel the Turks to make Constantinople once more the capital. What has happened in regard to the prohibition laws and, more latterly, the passport regulations, suggests that the Angora Administration is at the mercy of ignorant officials, from whose blunders the country has to be extricated with as much "face-saving" as can be contrived. This system might satisfy a native tribe in Central Africa, but must be galling to the self-respect of educated Turks, who are inclined to rank national dignity as high as independence.

Roumanian Politics.

The break that has recently taken place between the Peasants' Party and the National or Transylvanian Party is an interesting incident in Roumanian politics. Opposition to M. Bratianu's Liberal Government has been the chief bond hitherto between the two parties, and the close co-operation since last March has not produced any marked political success. At a congress of the Peasants' Party held towards the end of May the Executive was charged to open negotiations with the National Party with the view to fusion. Accordingly, a formal statement of the Peasants' political creed was drawn up and sent to Dr. Maniu, the leader of the Transylvanians, with a view to his endorsement of it as a basis for the formation of a single party. Dr. Maniu replied by a brief statement of his own party's creed, emphasising its aim at national solidarity, and stating that if the Peasants' Party proposed fusion on the basis of class divisions, there could be no question of negotiations to that end. The Peasants' Executive replied curtly by determining the co-operation between the two parties and reserving to itself complete freedom of action. The sensible stand taken by the Nationalists against the particularist pretensions of the Peasants' Party foreshadows, it is hoped, a more practical line of action in political affairs. Nothing has been more disappointing in Roumanian politics than the failure of the Transylvanians to make themselves an effective force in new Roumania. Their negative policy has entirely misfired. By separating themselves from the Peasants' Party, whose attitude towards the Monarchy is not above suspicion, they will be free to make a bid for the support of all Roumanians who hold that the time has come for policies rather than personal ambitions to determine the course of Roumanian politics.

The Little Entente.

Representatives of the Little Entente are to meet this month at Sinaia, the summer quarters of the Roumanian Court and Government, and it is understood that they will discuss the attitude of the three countries towards Hungary and Bulgaria. Much has happened in the former country to perpetuate the distrust with which it is regarded by its neighbours. The Little Entente was formed for purposes of self-defence against Hungary, and its mere existence, it might be thought, would be sufficient guarantee against any aggressive action on the part of the Budapest Government. But the main cause of trouble is that Hungary is divided against itself. Possibly the whole nation is at one in resenting the terms of peace imposed upon it; but only a section is prepared to commit national suicide by adopting a course of action that would inevitably bring down upon the whole people the vengeance of their neighbours. It is quite possible that the story of plots lose nothing in the telling, whether the information comes from foreign sources or from political opponents of the Government within; but no one can claim that the position in Hungary is a satisfactory one from the point of view of European peace. The Little Entente, therefore, may well feel justified in examining from time to time the details of its attitude towards Hungary. It should impress, however, upon the individual members that its real object is to remedy conditions in Hungary, and not to make them worse. Consequently, the physical force embodied in the Little Entente should not be abused for the exasperation of Magyar subjects of the Succession States. As far as Bulgaria is concerned, the rather chilling reception accorded to the new Government has been followed by formal recognition. The Bulgarians would probably have been much more impressed by a detached attitude, which would have argued that nothing happening in Bulgaria could affect the peace of the Balkans in view of the solidarity of her neighbours, and that these could, therefore, afford to let the future decide whether the change in Government was good or bad for Bulgaria herself.

International Loan to Greece.

It is satisfactory to learn that the arrangements for a loan to Greece to enable her to cope with the refugee problem are nearing completion. The Council of the League of Nations has, largely at the instance of Dr. Nansen, decided to lend its support for an international loan, which will be made to a special Refugee Bureau charged with the supervision of the plans for relief measures. In our issue of February 15 reference was made to certain works that might be undertaken in the Vardar and Struma valleys, which would not only give employment to a large number of refugee families, but would also reclaim land on which they will ultimately be able to support themselves. It is most desirable that the system of giving doles, whether of money or of food, should be terminated at the earliest possible moment, in the interests of the recipients. Where families are without male adults the doles will have to be continued, but the object to be aimed at should be the absorption as soon as possible of the able-bodied refugees into the economic life of the nation as producers. The area of Greece is not so large that a million refugees can be easily assimilated, owing to the extent of ground required for pasturage, which cannot be converted to any large extent to agricultural purposes without prejudice to the pastoral population. The problem, however, will be met to a certain extent by large reclamations of waste or swamp land.

Palestine.

In his speech at the annual dinner of the Central Asian Society Lord Milner laid stress on an aspect of the Palestine question which has often been insisted upon in these columns. The Arabs are exercised over what they have been told is going to happen; they are unable to point to any serious disabilities under the British Administration. Lord Milner let his audience understand that he regarded it as out of the question that there should be any immediate handing over of the country to the Arabs. It is certainly not going to be handed over to a Jewish minority. Great Britain is in duty bound to provide the disinterested Government which can keep the peace between the different sections of the population. The analogy of Irak, freed from the minorities problem, does not hold good; and the Arabs must reconcile themselves to taking a gradually increasing part in the Administration until such time as impartial government is assured without the direct participation of British officials.

The Indian Debate.

The interrupted debate on Indian affairs was concluded last week, and the majority in support of Lord Reading's action in certifying the salt tax was sufficiently above the normal figure to show that it was not determined by merely party considerations. The debate was necessarily discursive, and, in the absence of any luminous summing up, we anticipate that its real significance will not be immediately grasped in Indian circles; but its general effect is to show that the House of Commons maintains the position which we have consistently urged. The House is responsible for the new Constitution, and there was no hint of that "reaction" which Indian politicians imagine on every possible occasion; but, at the same time, there was no sign of any disposition to be hustled into the further action on which those politicians profess to have set their hearts. The Constitution is there to be worked, not tinkered; in due course it will be amended in the light of experience; and the condition of further advance is the successful working of the institutions which exist, rather than the eloquence or ingenuity with which their defects are put forward.

The British-Indian Union.

What is most needed just now is that as one of the speakers urged in the debate, all men of goodwill should get together to make the new Constitution a practical success, and from this point of view we welcome the appearance of the British-Indian Union, which was inaugurated publicly last week to promote friendship and understanding between the two countries. As to the credentials of the Union, it is perhaps sufficient to say that the President is the Duke of Connaught, the Nestor of the new India, while among the other speakers on the occasion were the Maharaja of Alwar and the Jam Sahib of Nawanagar. The Duke went straight to essentials, as he usually does. England and India, he urged, have a common object in the happiness and prosperity of both countries. They have had misunderstandings, but misunderstandings are things to be cleared away, not cherished. Much has been accomplished; but much remains to be done, and increase of mutual knowledge is the true line of advance. The Union cannot fail to accomplish much useful work if it adheres to the principles put forward by its President.

Digitized by Google

Indians in the Army.

The Indian Legislative Assembly was not at its best on the occasion of the debate on the "Indianisation" of the Army. As our readers know, Lord Rawlinson has done a very great deal to enable Indians to receive the King's Commission and to demonstrate in practice their ability to lead, as well as to command. The facilities offered are at present in excess of the demand, for the admissions offered to Sandhurst are filled only with great difficulty, and that by lowering the educational standard required; but the Assembly was not deterred by such facts from asking for more. As is usual on such occasions, the demand was made most loudly by representatives of the South, which has forgotten most of what it once knew about military affairs; and we may fairly set against their insistence the view put forward recently by Dr. Mullick, of Bengal, that the rate of "Indianisation" now depends less on the Commander-in-Chief than on the readiness of Indian parents to send their best boys into the Army, and to allow them enough to maintain their honourable position in it.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

A Week of Sport.

After the most ungallant show for the earlier cricket, tennis, and racing, the sun last week repented, and in the last few days fairly burned itself out for the sake of Henley and of Wimbledon. So exultingly, indeed, did it try to make up for lost time that on Saturday we reached 91 in the shade. At Henley it was one of the most delightful years, and not, as at Wimbledon, without its surprises. No one, for instance, expected the defeat in the Diamonds of the American Mr. Hoover—perhaps we had rated a little too high this fetish of American efficiency; and most people thought Pembroke, Cambridge, would get the Grand Challenge, instead of which they were beaten by a third of a length by Thames. However, it was all very glorious, with more people there than ever.

At Wimbledon things took their course inexorably. In the Ladies' Final Miss McKane could not get more than four games out of sixteen against Mlle. Lenglen, whose skill is so wonderful as to make the Press attacks upon her a little crude and, in any case, superfluous; and the Men's Singles was taken off with ease by the American, Mr. Johnston, who lost only one set in the whole of his playing. People talk of Lenglen and of Johnston as machines, but it is an absurd kind of compliment. About both of them there is a relentless humanity; I suppose it is because their beauty is rather classical than romantic—in other words, they have succeeded in attaining glory at the expense of death—that their accuracy is accounted to them an unexciting virtue. It was because the two "children" of Wimbledon, Miss Austin and Miss Colyer, possessed in such wild abundance the opposite virtues to those of Lenglen and Johnston—they smiled at and smashed for death or glory equally—that the sentimental crowd took them to its thrilling heart.

A British record was broken at Stamford Bridge on Saturday when E. H. Liddell, the Scottish champion did the hundred in 9 7-10 sec., the previous record being 9 4-5 sec.

The Dockers' Strike.

The unusual feature about the dock strike that is now taking place in many parts of the country is the disregard by the men of their leaders' advice. Actually the dispute centres round the figures prepared by the Board of Trade to estimate the cost of living—an index by which the men agreed nine months ago to abide. Reductions in wages based on these figures have been proposed, but rejected by the men. The strikers have, in short, broken their word.

Naturally, the whole Press of the country is against the men. Practically every journal looks at the matter from a severely moral aspect, and takes the vital point of the case to be the acceptance nine months ago of the index figure. But surely this is a little hard on men whose margin of life does not allow for the indulgence of nice moralities; surely the accuracy or inaccuracy of that index figure is the vital point. No one knows better than the wife of the docker what the cost of living is, and when, in this very hot weather, the announcement is suddenly made to him that his wages are to be reduced by five or six shillings, well—what he says about the gentlemen at the Board of Trade who prepare the statistics which show that he should be able to buy more beer had perhaps better not be related.

The Small-pox Scare.

The scare of small-pox, which is now being widely canvassed, is not without its amusing side. But first the matter should be viewed seriously. The Ministry of Health has become quite impressed with its own statistics, and even goes to the length of saying that "there is a distinct risk of an outbreak of a serious character." But apparently the Ministry is satisfied that in vaccination is an adequate remedy. The trouble is: How to get people to be vaccinated. This is where the entertainment comes in. Individualistic and liberty-loving journals like the Morning Post are all for compulsory Socialism in this matter; and we hear strange phrases from them like "anti-social" individuals, the interests of "the whole community," and so forth. Others, more moderate, but perhaps not more effective, suggest a propaganda campaign on behalf of vaccination, which has fallen of recent years into some disrepute. Undoubtedly, the chief bugbear of the State authorities is the indolence, not the hostility, of the public; but one really cannot see a vaccination propaganda cutting much ice, even in this tropical weather. It is the way of the English to put off precautions until the time of panic; the people who regularly go to the dentist before their teeth ache are far fewer than they would have us believe.

The Bank Rate.

I expect that my colleague "Commentator" will elsewhere explain the inner meaning of the rise in the Bank rate, which advanced last week from 3 to 4 per cent. What was interesting from the layman's point of view was the surprise expressed by most people that the present moment should have been chosen for the change and the difficulty of finding out how precisely it will affect business. However, it is not for us ordinary people, who are unmoved by all this jargon about "cheap" and "dear" money, to worry about it.

A National Theatre.

There are sensitive men in the House of Lords, and it was obvious a day or two ago when, during a discussion on the desirability of a State subvention for the drama, humiliation was expressed at our neglect of the drama compared with the Continental attitude. For a time, it is true, the debate ran rather off the lines when time was wasted over a proposal to raise a theatre at Stratford-on-Avon in memory of Shakespeare; but, at least, some of the Lords saw that, to have a "national" theatre, we must have a chain of theatres in all the densely populated towns. A local memorial to Shakespeare at Stratford could no more touch the dramatic life of the nation than, say, the movement at Glastonbury touches its musical life. Even a theatre in London devoted to Shakespeare would not be sufficient recognition; his plays should permeate the whole community.

Of course, the times, in the Government's view, were too hard for the granting of money to the drama; perhaps they will always in this country be too hard.

The University Match.

Although Oxford, because of their possession of eight Old Blues, ought to have this year's match at Lord's in their keeping, the result, quite apart from the reservation which it is always necessary to make about "nerves," cannot easily be foreseen. I write before to-day's play, and consequently lay myself open to the charge of being foolish. But, speaking generally, there is little doubt that the two sides this year are below the usual level. The fielding especially is, so far, said to have been mediocre; the batting certainly has been very in and out; and of the bowlers on either side, only G. O. Allen has genius. Men like Ashton and Lowry may turn the day for Cambridge; but if they fail, Oxford ought to be able to get enough runs to win. Oxford have won only once since 1914, and they have some terrible memories to efface.

The Eton and Harrow match, which takes place at the end of this week, is a very different affair, because everybody, except Etonians, wants Harrow to win. Harrow have not won since goodness knows when, and lovers of schoolboy cricket have grown quite sentimental about the fact.

The Traffic Problem.

Considerable apprehensions have for some time been entertained by the experts on the dimensions to which the problem of traffic in London has grown; and it would appear that the present heat-wave is directing more urgently the attention of the public upon it. It is quite possible, for instance, nowadays to consume twenty-five minutes in getting by bus from Liverpool Street to the far side of the Bank; and one has the certainty of time for reflection by centres like the Mansion House, Piccadilly Circus, or Kingsway. The question is a huge one, and though one hears rumours of the abolition of horse-driven traffic, of new motor routes, of one-route roads, and so on, it is fairly universally agreed that there is but one solution—the creation of a supreme traffic authority. At the moment, of course, there are hundreds of authorities, acting quite independently of each other, and, it is sometimes hinted, a little maliciously towards one another. The conciliation of the existing authorities will not be easy; but it is one of the few Socialist schemes which really should be tried. When the drivers of the traffic themselves see no solution, it is time that the State stepped in.

Sunday Games.

The Sabbath in this country has long ceased to be regarded as a day of rest; even those who do not use it publicly to take part in ordinary-day pursuits are not ashamed to follow in secret their pagan fancies. The Puritan ideal is, in short, for practical purposes, dead. But, as ever, we are slow to incorporate realities into our institutions, and the present discussion over the desirability of playing games on Sundays has discovered the existence of many people to whom an officially sanctioned overthrowing of the ideal of the Nonconformist Sabbath is objectionable. A campaign to stop games on Sundays is, in fact, in full swing—games for the poor, that is, because the rich and the middle-class have for some time indulged their various bents. But these campaigners are sadly in the minority; and their reasoning is not strengthened by some recent words of the Dean of Exeter, who said: "The Puritan view of Sunday is not binding on all Christian people." That dictum should be good enough for the Catholics and the Anglicans; for the millions of others it was, of course, superfluous. No doubt we are becoming decadent; but, then, we always were; certainly we are going to be merrier than we have been since the Reformation.

ALTER EGO.

The Bengal Legislative Council has rejected the Government Bill designed to authorise preventive officers to conduct searches in cases of suspected illicit manufacture of salt without the presence of police officers, as at present required.

On July 3, at the Viceregal Lodge, at Simla, the Viceroy bestowed the gold Kaisar-i-Hind Medal, with bar, upon Mrs. Starr, and the medal upon Khan Bahadur Khulikhan and Risaldar Mosul Baz Khan, who assisted her in her rescue of Miss Ellis.

A Reuter's message states that, with the approval of the Persian Government, two of the latest two-seater fighting aeroplanes of the British Air Force flew to Teheran last week from Baghdad on a complimentary visit.

Egyptian Martial Law.

Egypt can seldom have known a week so productive of legislation as the one just past. The Council of Ministers, sitting at Alexandria on Wednesday afternoon, approved no fewer than ten new laws, besides a number of important regulations. The most important of the new statutes was that constituting an Egyptian code of martial law—to which I referred in my last letter—as a necessary forerunner to the promulgation of the Indemnity Act and the abolition of British martial law. Although the new Act is throughout of a conservative character and limits the power of the authorities to take exceptional measures to a far greater extent than is usual in most countries, it has met with a good deal of criticism in the Arabic Press. It is in some ways unfortunate that the new enactment became popularly known in anticipation as Egyptian martial law. Had it been called the Egyptian Riot Act the present misapprehensions regarding its scope and purpose might well have never arisen. Martial law has during the last nine years come to mean to the Egyptians nothing more nor less than the system by which British control of the country is exercised. So, in fact, it is, but it is a pity that sight has been lost of other aspects of the matter. It has not been generally recognised that every Government may be confronted with exceptional circumstances for which the ordinary civil code does not make adequate provision, and which demand the exercise of wider powers than are enjoyed by the authorities in normal times. There has even been in some quarters the belief that the Egyptian martial law code was to become operative as soon as British martial law was removed—that it was, in fact, to supersede the latter. Given this belief, the existing feeling regarding the new statute is quite understandable. Unpopular as the present system of British control is, it has not affected one in a thousand of the inhabitants of this country. But nobody knows better than the Egyptians themselves what would be the probable result of giving to an Egyptian executive the almost unlimited powers now entrusted to the Commander-in-Chief of the British Forces here. Fears of the likely consequences of such a step are entirely comprehensible. It is to be hoped that, now that the purpose and limitations of the new measure have been made public, the Egyptians will understand that the new decrees do not mean simply the exchange of whips for scorpions.

Other New Ordinances.

The other two most important statutes approved on Wednesday were an Act dealing with vagabondage and a regulation regarding passports. The former is designed in the interests of public security, to prevent the entry into this country of refugees and persons with no visible means of support, and also to deal with undesirables actually resident here. The passports regulation, the text of which has not yet been published, it having been found that some slight modifications were necessary, practically confirms the rules regarding the issue of passports which have been in force for the last nine years under British martial law.

It is not universally realised why this sudden large crop of legislation should be necessary now, just before the Egyptian Parliament will come into existence and undertake the work of statute framing on constitutional lines. The reason is, of course, that, owing to the peculiar circumstances existing in this country since the outbreak of war in 1914, there has been neither the need nor the occasion to enact laws to meet the changed conditions which have arisen here, as in every country in the world. New problems, as they have arisen, have been solved by issuing proclamations under British martial law. Hence there are many powers now exercised under that code which, unless provided for by some other means before its abolition, will vanish automatically. It is to prevent that sudden lapse of necessary powers that the new statutes have been framed and made operative.

The Conspiracy Trial.

At last the conspiracy trial is approaching its end. The defence has called over sixty witnesses, and will probably conclude its evidence on Tuesday. Mr. Silley, leading counsel for the accused, expects to address the Court on Wednesday, or, rather, to begin his address on that day, for it is improbable that he will be able to sum up the enormous mass of most conflicting evidence in one session, although, in order to get through the proceedings, which have been going on since April 5 last, the Court sits continuously, with a break of a few minutes only, from 8.30 a.m. to after 2 p.m. daily. The total cost of the trial will be enormous; a recent estimate put the figure at £25,000, and this was probably on the conservative side.

Departures.

The steady stream of applications by foreign officials to be allowed to leave the Government service shows no diminution, and is causing very real concern to the Egyptians, who realise how valuable have been the services of the men whom they are losing. It is to be hoped that the tardy awakening to this fact will speed up the conclusion of an agreement, satisfactory to both parties, which will enable officials who would otherwise throw their hands in now to remain a few years longer, in the knowledge of exactly how they will stand when the agreed further period of service is concluded. Such a scheme is now being considered by the British officials themselves. Its nature is being kept extremely secret, but, so far as I can gather, it is considered fairly satisfactory.

Among the well-known Anglo-Egyptians who will be leaving us during the next few weeks is Mr. J. F. G. Hopkins, Director of the Bureau of Commerce and Industry, which department he has developed into a model of efficiency and utility to the industries of the country, as well as, incidentally, providing one of the most interesting exhibitions in Cairo. Another forthcoming departure is that of Lieut.-Colonel C. M. Hickley, C.M.G., D.S.O., Director of Inland Navigation in the Ministry of Communications. Before the War, Colonel Hickley was in the Sudan Government Service. During the campaigns in Palestine and Syria he was Assistant Director of Railway Transport at General Headquarters, being the link between Sir Walter Campbell, the Deputy Quartermaster-General, and Sir George Macauley, at the head of the Railway Administration. In 1919, when Sir George was appointed adviser to the newly formed Ministry of Communications, he secured the transfer to his Ministry of Colonel Hickley, to take over the inland transport branch of the Ministry.

An outgoing official who has been even more in the public eye than either of those just mentioned is Hopkinson Pasha, Director-General of the Alexandria Municipality, and perhaps the most criticised man in Egypt. Inhabitants of Alexandria are never tired of bewailing the condition of their city. Its smells, they claim, are supreme in the Levant, their only rival the odours of Smyrna. For all this and much more Hopkinson Pasha is held responsible. Every dead cat and every decaying fish-head is metaphorically laid at his door. And nobody can deny that Alexandria is an exceptionally nidorous town. But for this fact neither the Director-General of the Municipality nor his staff is to blame. The inhabitants themselves, with their detestation of hygienic measures and their indifference to cleanliness, present an insuperable obstacle to hopes of realising a cleaner Alexandria. Since 1917 enormous improvements have been made in the general condition of the city, especially where the roads, which suffered greatly from heavy military traffic, are concerned. The Municipal budget has been retrieved from its state of chronic deficit, and there is now the possibility of undertaking extensive new improvement works of all kinds which, without wise and careful management during the past few years, would have been quite impossible. Fortunately, Hopkinson Pasha's shoulders have been broad enough to bear all the unconsidered blame laid upon them. It is generally recognised, by all who know Alexandria and its conflicting national rivalries, which do so much to prevent effective action by the City Fathers, that the Municipality, under its retiring Director-General, has during the past few years accomplished very much good work.

I referred some weeks back to the impending departure of Mr. Harry Aspinall, secretary since its foundation of the Turf Club, Cairo. He left on Tuesday for England, and there was a very big gathering at the station to see him off. A new secretary has not yet been appointed, Mr. J. H. C. Brougham is filling the post temporarily.

Sales of Furniture.

One result of the British exodus is an unusual number of sales of furniture. Good furniture is usually very hard to buy in Egypt, except at prohibitive prices, and solid, comfortable English furniture has hitherto been almost unobtainable. The British officials' houses, which are remarkable for the comfort of their appointments, have nearly all been furnished from home. Now a lot of really excellent stuff is being sold by auction, and much of it is going at very low prices. It is a rare opportunity for newly married couples setting up homes of their own; but of those there are very few nowadays among the British community in Egypt. Instead of settling down in Egypt, nearly everybody one meets is talking of settling up and getting out of the country.

Excavations.

The excavations at Beisan organised by the University of Pennsylvania have been renewed. About a fortnight ago Dr. Fisher, who is in charge of the expedition, was rewarded by the discovery of important Egyptian remains in the shape of considerable buildings apparently used as a garrison and arsenal. A large stock of arrow-heads were found, bound up in bundles of ten, and, most important, two monumental inscriptions, belonging to Seti I. and his famous son, Rameses II. These stelae give details of military dispositions, and refer to many towns on both sides of the Jordan. The chief historical value in the results of the excavations so far is the proof of Egyptian occupation of Syria extending over five hundred years.

The British School of Archæology have also been busy in the field. They have just finished work at Tantura (half-way between Cæsarea and Athlit, and the site of classical Dora). They have discovered indications that there was here a considerable city of the same age and scale as Askalon.

Arab (Christian) paper, writes in reference to Article 2 :—"The points referring to the protection of the civil and religious rights of the Arabs are word for word identical with the second part of the Balfour Declaration; and whoever examines them will at once perceive that there is no reference to the political rights of which the Balfour Declaration deprives the Arabs. This Treaty supports and confirms the Balfour Declaration with the express consent of King Hussein." The paper goes on to stress the obligations which King Hussein has assumed to recognise Great Britain's peculiar position in Palestine: "this is its position as holder of a Mandate whose object is to set up in Palestine a National Home for the Jews; in other words—were it not for the Jewish National Home, England would not be in Palestine at all, and so the acknowledgment of this position is the explicit recognition of the Jewish National Home." The Mirât esh-Sharq then discusses the clause obliging King Hussein to exert his influence on behalf of England. "What influence can King Hussein have over Palestine except a religious influence and that borne by virtue of his distinguished family, which is held to be directly descended from that of Mohammed? So he is to exert this influence to enable his partner in the Treaty to attain his purpose in Palestine—the building up of a National Home for the Jews!"

June 22.

The Lake Huleh Incident.

As was to be expected, the Palestinian malcontents and their sympathisers have tried hard to make political capital out of the murder of the three British police at Lake Huleh, and exaggerated stories are still in circulation, the object of them being to make it appear that the outrage was directed against the High Commissioner himself. The facts were exactly as explained last week. The criminals themselves, under examination, explained how they were hard pressed by the French authorities in Syria, crossed the frontier, and on being suddenly confronted by a body of soldiers thought that these, too, were on their tracks, and so fired in "self-defence." And this can be accepted as the true version.

The Murder of Captain Swann.

The serious impression caused by this incident was deepened by the murder, last Friday, of Captain Swann, the Paymaster of the British Gendarmerie, who met his death in the course of one of the now alarmingly frequent cases of highway robbery. This was near Ludd. The murderer, still at large, is a ruffian with a long record of crime, unparalleled, probably, even in Palestine. His last feat was to take up a position on a frequented road, hold up every passer-by, take them off to a neighbouring cave, rob them and leave them all there till his victims reached the total of seventy; and not till then did he release them and allow the hue and cry to be raised. Reports of similar acts of violence on a smaller scale frequently reach us from almost every quarter of Palestine. It is absurd to put these down to political discontent, as has been done by certain elements of the Arab Press. A violent outcry is being raised against the inefficiency of the police. Palestine is certainly, to all appearances, heavily equipped in the way of military and police protection in proportion to its population; but the present spasm of lawlessness cannot be said to be fostered by the inefficiency of the police so much as by the admirable suitability of the geography and the landscape. Palestine has always been excellently adapted to bandit warfare.

The Arab Congress.

The "Sixth Arab Congress," which began last Saturday at Jaffa, has completed its sessions. It is not easy to estimate the precise weight and importance of this body and its findings. These Congresses began in December, 1920, with the meeting at Haifa of thirty-six politically minded Arabs, since when they have gradually increased their number of delegates until at the last meeting there were a hundred and fourteen. They are the only articulate body of Arabs in Palestine, but whether their findings can be regarded as representing the considered opinion of Palestine Arabdom as a whole is questionable. The Congress first met as a body of like-minded men with a common grievance; and they have enlarged their membership by co-opting further like-minded Arabs. They have never disagreed among themselves in fundamentals, and such differences of opinion as have arisen have been mostly of the nature of whether some policy or other ought to be applied promptly, come what may, or whether it should be applied after some forethought. There has, of course, never been any question of "election" to these Congresses in the conventional sense (one still remains utterly sceptical as to the feasibility of popular general elections in Palestine, no matter for what purpose), and there has so far been no clear proof that what this Congress decides becomes thereby common Arab policy (the Election boycott is a possible exception); for example, the last meeting of the Congress determined on a "voluntary" levy of two piastres a head, per month, on all Arabs, to send a Delegation to America, to open a Palestinian Arab Bureau in London, to open branches of the Moslem-Christian Association in every village and town, to write a patriotic history of the rise of the Arab movement—none of which things (owing to the failure of the first) has been realised.

This last Congress passed twenty-eight resolutions which followed expected lines. The most important of them are the repudiation of the Anglo-Arab Treaty, and the decision to refuse to pay all taxes "on the English principle of no taxation without representation"! The question whether this last resolution should be applied at once or be referred to a committee, occupied a large proportion of the Congress's time, and it was decided by a very small majority to take the more moderate line. The assertion was made by one of the members that whereas in pre-War days taxation worked out at ten shillings a head per annum, it was now three pounds.

newly devised Palestine Advisory Council. The formal grounds of their resignation have been published. They are :—

(1) The Government did not issue a new proclamation as it promised, but rested content with publishing in the Official Gazette the Privy Council's statement about the Constitution of the Palestine Council.

(2) This Order showed that the Palestine Council resembled the Legislative Council in its numbers and constitution as laid down in the Palestine Constitution, as though the latter still remained in force; whereas the whole nation had opposed it and taken no part in the elections.

(3) The Council consists in the main of mere nominated members, whereas the two Jewish members are elected representatives of all the Jews in Palestine.

The Emigration of Jews.

Jewish circles are taking alarm at the considerable emigration of young able-bodied Jews from the country. The emigration offices are being thronged by Jews from all parts of the country seeking visas to leave Palestine as quickly as possible. Work is hard to find, prospects are not rosy, and ideals alone fail to satisfy the needs of the body. An entire Jewish Colony, Beer Tobiah (one of the most southerly Jewish settlements, not far from Ashdod) is being depopulated, and the few, about ten, surviving elderly colonists, unable to work the ground themselves, are letting tracts of it to the neighbouring Arabs.

The Circassian "Marriage by Capture."

Beyond Jordan is a community of Circassians, stationed there many years ago by the Turks as a buffer-garrison against the inroads of the desert Bedouin. Among their native customs they brought with them that of "marriage by capture." The Circassians have been largely recruited for the police-force on both sides of the Jordan. A few days ago one of these Transjordanian Circassian police, a sergeant, making use of the custom and the opportunity, secured the help of some of his fellow police, attacked a house and captured a wealthy Circassian widow, who had come from Damascus to the wilds of Transjordania to look after some property. The police-sergeant ran off with her to Kerak, where he proposed to finish off the ceremony. Unfortunately he had omitted one thing, which is, curiously, regarded as essential even in "marriage by capture"—to secure the lady's consent. Appeal was made to the authorities, and King Abdullah ordered the arrest of the would-be groom, and, still more curiously, marked the beginning of the era of Transjordanian independence by decreeing that in future this Circassian "marriage by capture" was forbidden.

PERSIA.

Teheran, May 25.

The Elections.

Public interest during the past fortnight has centred almost entirely round the elections for the new Parliament, which are now in full swing throughout the country. Voting in Teheran closed on Thursday, but the result is not yet known, and in view of the fact that there are several hundred candidates for the twelve seats allotted to the Capital it would be rash to prophesy who will be elected, though it is expected that most of the representatives in the present Mejliss will be returned again.

The Northern Oil Concession.

The question of the Northern Oil Concession has again been debated in the Mejliss, and several of the clauses have been adopted. One provides that the Concession must be granted to an independent American Company, and another that one of the Northern provinces, to be decided later, be excluded from the Concession, the fifth province to form a separate Concession to be granted to a purely Persian company for exploitation with Persian capital. The duration of the Concession to be granted to the American Company is to be at least forty, and not more than fifty, years from the date of its ratification by the Mejliss, and the concession-holder must agree to grant the Persian Government, on ratification by the Parliament, a loan of at least ten million dollars to be paid through an American Bank, on terms to be decided later, such as to be most advantageous to the Persian Government.

A Persian Concession.

In connection with the Concession to be granted to a Persian Company, Haji Moin ut Tujjar Bushiri, who has recently been granted the Concession for red oxide in the island of Ormuz in the Persian Gulf, has formed a Company with a view to applying for the Concession for the province. He agrees to pay the Government either twelve per cent. on the gross output, instead of the ten per cent. originally proposed, or twenty per cent. instead of sixteen per cent. on the net profits, as Royalties, on condition that the extra percentage be devoted towards public instruction.

Non-Payment Again.

The Police Force in Kazvin recently went on strike as a protest against the non-payment of their salaries for several months past, and the Military in garrison there have been reinforced by a detachment from Teheran, and are patrolling the streets. Everything is quite quiet.

Sardar Sepah.

The Minister of War is attempting to stop the papers publishing laudatory articles praising him and his work. He reminds the Press, in a notice in the semi-official organ Iran that the most sacred of his duties is to maintain order in the country and ensure tranquillity and happiness for the population, and that he has no intention of diverting a single moment to questions of minor details which do not concern the public welfare. He requests the Press, therefore, to abstain from citing him on every possible occasion in future, and to confine themselves to their much more important rôle as educators of the nation. The Iran, commenting on this, sees in it a fresh proof of the earnestness and straightforwardness of Sardar Sepah, and praises the spirit of his sacrifices for the good of the country, which he has, by his efforts and sterling work, caused to taste the totally new savour of security and tranquillity.

Russian Moneys.

The recent British Note to the Soviet Government caused a certain amount of uneasiness and excitement among the Russian concerns in Resht and Kazvin, and they immediately withdrew any balances that they had with the Imperial Bank, presumably acting under instructions from Moscow, fearing the possible consequences of the Note on relations between the Russian and British Governments.

Constantinople, June 26.

The Russian Refugees.

Our local domestic affairs are, for the time being, going on peacefully enough. A further advance is being made in what at one time appeared to be an insoluble problem, that of the Russian refugees. A couple of years ago it was estimated that there were 120,000 to 150,000 refugees from Russia here. A few months ago that number was stated to have been reduced to about 12,000, the rest having been accepted by Yugoslavia or Bulgaria or having returned to Russia. Since the beginning of June, the emigration season to the U.S.A. has restarted, and on the three steamers which have left for New York, emigrants from Constantinople have numbered about 1,000, chiefly Russians. Three more steamers are announced to leave in the near future, and more Russians are busy completing the necessary formalities in preparation for leaving.

Sport.

British sport, military and civil, is flourishing. The Constantinople cricket club and the various unit clubs in the Army have a full list of fixtures, which have provided some good matches. The British Army Sports meeting on Friday and Saturday week at Moda was a great success, and a large number of civil and military guests contributed to a gay scene, and had the pleasure of seeing some remarkably good performances, and of appreciating the value of a perfectly organised meeting, enlivened by the music of several military bands. The lawn tennis championship of Turkey is being arranged by a committee drawn chiefly from Army tennis circles, and will shortly take place on the British United Services Club courts at Harbie. The remnants of the Salonika Army, to the number of 32 officers and ex-officers, dined together for the third year in succession on June 22, the evening on which similar functions took place at the Hotel Cecil in London and in Cologne. Sir Charles Harington was the guest of honour, and cordial telegrams were exchanged with the late C.-in-C., General Sir G. F. Milne.

The New Turkey.

In connection with the proceedings at Lausanne, a fact upon which too much emphasis cannot be laid, is that the Nationalist Turkey of June, 1923, is a quite different proposition from the Turkey of October, 1922. The apparent renaissance of military and political Turkey last autumn was a flash in the pan. The flash has gone out, and dust and ashes remain. The outburst of national enthusiasm and unity has degenerated to a sordid campaign of intrigue of Turk against Turk. The Army, which is the only trump in Angora's hand, has consistently grown weaker in numbers and spirit. The familiar phenomenon of general intriguing against general is repeating itself. Noureddin Pasha is in disgrace, Fevzi Pasha is not in good odour, widespread discontent reigns among all the officers at the suppression of their own political organisation. All ranks are either underpaid or not paid at all. Demobilisation of various classes is proceeding apace owing to the impossibility of feeding and paying the troops.

Politically, the new Turkey has played her two trumps, which have been promptly over-trumped. The bogey of the Moscow alliance has dissolved into thin smoke, and the hope of fundamental divisions between the Great Powers she destroyed herself by intransigeance on the External Debt questions. Quem Deus vult perdere . . .

That is the so-called Power with which Europe is wasting time in a huckstering bargain, which in tone reminds us of nothing so much as buying fish in an Oriental bazaar.

The Elections Farce.

The elections in Constantinople have been an eye-opener for those who have conscientiously tried to be more than just to the new Turkish Government. It is known that the spirit of Constantinople, even the Turkish part of it, is very lukewarm towards the Angora oligarchy owing to the few months' experience of its most unsatisfactory administration. The result of the elections last Thursday, however, shows that each of the fifteen candidates of the Government (Defence of Rights) party received more than 1,180 votes out of a possible 1,254, and of the twenty-six Independent candidates only eight received any votes at all, and of these, Noureddin Pasha, the Commander of the Army at Ismid, received the greatest number, viz., 100. The disparity is too ludicrous for words. The whole proceedings were an elaborate farce, and when we add that Noureddin Pasha has fallen into deep disgrace because he dared to put up his candidature on an Independent ticket, the present state of affairs will be admitted to be intolerable.

The Patriarchate.

Diplomacy is in process of finding a way out of the difficulty about the Patriarchate. The recent assault upon the Patriarch's person has been followed up by the threat of judicial proceedings involving the legality of the Patriarch's status vis-à-vis the Turkish Government and the validity of his excommunication of the turbulent M. Damianides, who is doubtless acting as the convenient tool of the Turkish authorities, to whom Mgr. Meletios is personally obnoxious. It is an open secret that the Greek Foreign Office at the present stage of affairs would welcome the sacrifice of personalities in order to avoid causes of friction with the Turkish Government, and has been pressing the Patriarch gracefully to withdraw from the scene. He has now yielded, and announced his intention of retiring to the Mylopotamos Monastery on Mount Athos. Without going into the political pros and cons of the affair, it seems a pity from the human side that his bold attempt at keeping his end up against great odds should have failed, but, if he has to go, he had better go now while there is some sort of check upon the Turkish passion for eliminating anything non-Turkish. The attitude of the Greek community towards their future in Constantinople is eloquently illustrated by the figures which have recently been published by the Aksham. According to this paper, 485 Greek business houses here have closed down since November 2 last, including 18 important firms which have ceased business altogether and 21 which have been transferred elsewhere.

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS.

"ADMIRAL OF THE OCEAN-SEA." By Mary Johnston. (London: Thornton Butterworth. 7s. 6d. net.)

This is a long, historical novel, dealing with the voyages of discovery made by Christopher Columbus and told through a Spaniard who accompanies him. It is written, as are all Miss Johnston's novels, with great detail and thoroughness, and with an air of authority. She shows Columbus as more than an ambitious explorer—as an idealist with a great vision The book is lighted up by the admiration with which the great man and the prophetic vision which she shows him as possessing, have inspired the author. The first sight of unknown land and the sense of dreamlike peace which is felt on the landing in a new world are wonderfully described and remain in the memory.

This book might be found to be too long, but it cannot fail to impress by the imagination shown in the descriptions and by the spirit of enthusiasm in which it is written.

INDIAN HEROES.

"A TALE OF INDIAN HEROES: Being the Stories of the Mahabharata and Ramayana." By Flora Annie Steel. (London: Hutchinson. 10s. 6d. net.).

Mrs. Steel tells very simply tales from the Mahabharata and the Ramayana. She says that from these immense epics (the English translation of the Mahabharata fills thirty-two thick volumes) she has taken some of the "priceless gems" and hung them on "the central thread of pure gold" which runs through the stories. One would need to be a student of these ancient writings to be able to judge of Mrs. Steel's translation and selection, but the result is a book with much to stir the heart It will have a place on children's bookshelves beside the legends of Ancient Greece, stories from the Norse Sagas, the Irish legends, and the more merely human adventures of the Round Table knights and Charlemagne's Paladins. We do not mean that this is a book only for children, but the youthful imagination is quickly fired by accounts of deeds of courage, chivalry, and endurance, and this glimpse of the heroic age of an ancient land will introduce new warriors to the company of heroes.

In the Mahabharata we see virtues and faults, love and hate depicted on a vast and simplified scale. Mrs. Steel does not lay very much stress on what must be the deeply spiritual aspect of these epics—but, even in these briefly told adventures, it is impossible to miss the sense of seeing the individual struggle of the spirit reflected in the mighty doings of these warriors and incarnations of gods. We think that Mrs. Steel must have reproduced the feeling of the original very well in the description of the fateful battle of the heroes. We hear the thunder of the warring of beings more than human. We feel that sense of pre-ordained tragedy that broods over Regnarök and the horror of the inability of the most heroic to achieve against the will of the gods that darkens the Plains of Troy.

There is present in the Mahabharata that subtle element of tragedy which we find in so many of the great legends of the nations—the doubled bitterness of enmity that, but for the coincidences of fate, should have been love. Arjuna and Karna, who are brothers and do not know it, whose achievements are so nearly equal, fight to the end with unquenchable bitterness. When Karna is slain and the truth is told too late, the patient and just Yudistra cries despairingly, "O mother of five living sons, by thee have we been undone. Hadst thou not kept this secret, all things might have been attainable, even peace." But, whereas in most Western legends we should be left with the echo of hopeless regret—here it is silenced by the firm voice of Bhishma, "What has been is Fate. I counselled peace ever; but it was not written so."

Bhishma the Terrible—the grandsire—acting according to an ideal of renunciation and loyalty to which only an Eastern mind could attain, stands out as the greatest of these great figures.

Of the Ramayana Mrs. Steel says that it is "more poetical, less real . . . one feels in reading it that the really heroic age of India has passed." She gives the impression of being less interested in it. We are given, however, a great idea of its decorative qualities and the richness of its fantasy. Motives and character are subtler and more complicated than in the Mahabharata. There is more "illusion" and a more unreal world, full of demons and magic. We must be grateful to Mrs. Steel for this simply told account of the love of Râma and Sita and of the exploits of the "high-souled monkeys," under the guidance of the famous wise monkey Hunumân.

Even an outline such as this of these epics, which are famous throughout India, help to a better understanding of its people. We are left after reading it with many vivid, richly coloured pictures in the mind—such as that of Yudistra and the crafty Shakuni casting their dice, watched by the jewelled courtiers; or that of the weapons in mortal guise doing homage to the youthful Râma. And beyond this we are left with an impression of great space and distance, and of the depth of the ancient spiritual life of the people.

EGYPT'S NEW ERA.

The publication last Thursday of an Indemnity Act and of a proclamation abrogating martial law will serve as a landmark in the political history of Egypt. Although there are certain points in Anglo-Egyptian relations still to be settled, at least it may now be definitely said that the future of the Egyptian people is in their own hands. That they are now in a position to choose their own representatives, to establish a free Parliamentary Government, is mainly due to the persistent wisdom of Lord Allenby; but, more latterly, due also to their own sense in refraining from such murders and demonstrations as made absolutely necessary the retention of martial law. The optimist, indeed, will find ground for his beliefs in the conduct of the Egyptians during the last few weeks, when concession after concession has been made to them. It is as a climax, an inevitable but very satisfactory climax, that the abrogation of martial law has come; and we congratulate Egypt, as we congratulate ourselves, upon the opportunity of fulfilling our promises. Great Britain can now stand clear, and the Egyptians are free to "run their own show." The political amnesty that has been proclaimed is complete but for those Egyptians, sentenced under martial law, who were convicted of common law crimes of a serious kind. Members of the Wafd have returned; Zaghloul Pasha himself may, if he wishes, go back to Egypt to conduct an electoral campaign. In short, the erstwhile extremists have unfettered permission to demonstrate their conversion to soberness during the last few months. Compared with this fact, which is really one for the imagination to seize upon—so remote did the possibility of its realisation appear but a year or two ago—the Indemnity Act and its accompanying convention are unimportant. They were, of course, highly necessary, but they do not radically affect the situation, and are notable mainly in that they show a wise head and a steady purpose in the person of the Egyptian Premier, Yehia Ibrahim Pasha. His worth is sufficiently proved by the mere fact that it was during his tenure of office that the hated, and, to tell the truth, hateful, exercise of martial law was finally abolished.

How this latest step will immediately affect Egypt is uncertain. Probably it will draw a dull kind of welcome and ensure a period of quiet until certain matters that are now obscure have been clarified. For this independence of Egypt is by no means the independence of which rebels dream; it resembles much more closely the independence which is thinly extracted by modern yet backward States in a closely knit scheme of things from powerful and watchful sovereignties. The people of Egypt cannot, for instance, change their Constitution—such power is reserved to the King alone. We are, further, not exactly clear as to how the High Commissioner stands to the King; the High Commissioner has the main effective force in the country, and it would seem, therefore, what can scarcely have been Great Britain's intention, that the power of the throne is dependent on the British Army's support. We have not been told, moreover, of the essential conditions of Britain's remaining in Egypt—the conditions affecting the position and strength of the British forces, the control of Egyptan finance, the judicial status of foreigners, the capitulations, and the government of the Sudan. Such questions were originally to have been settled before the path was made clear to the establishment of a free Parliamentary régime; and it makes the situation much more hopeful to find the solution of these questions postponed until after such an establishment. But we mention the existence of these obscurities in order to guard against undue elation or premature rejoicing. Great Britain has, indeed, proved the honesty of her intentions, but with it she has also declared their limits, and will maintain her special position in Egypt.

Within certain bounds, then, the Egyptians hold the destiny of their country in their own hands. Upon what they will make of it we do not care to speculate. Nor do we propose to expound here any long view in regard to Egypt. It may be that Yehia Ibrahim Pasha will succeed in his endeavours to keep his people calm during electoral excitements, and to insist on their preserving a moderate attitude during the period of adaptation to the normal régime. It may well be, on the other hand, that the Zaghloulists will swamp the country, and, perhaps, will run amok. Or it may be that other parties, for all of which the High Commissioner is resolved to secure fairplay, may assert themselves. The number of contingencies is, in fact, enormous, and, while we may prepare for the worst to happen, we may at least hope that our troubles, as far as the use of force is concerned, are ended. There are, it is true, many intelligent men in this country, with vast experience of Egyptian affairs, and, indeed, of the affairs of kindred Eastern States, who believe that the worst will happen, and that Great Britain will have again to proclaim a Protectorate. Others go even further, and assert that it is in world interests that the influence of Great Britain in Egypt should remain paramount; but it is difficult, in these later cynical days, to put forward such high motives as justification for the adoption of unpopular courses. In any case, it would appear that the views of these men have not been overlooked by Great Britain, which will remain at hand for emergencies. But the promise of political independence having been made to the Egyptians, there was nothing for it but to fulfil that promise; and if, contrary to many expectations, the Egyptian people take a sanely moderate view of the position, so much the better for them, for ourselves, and for the general world.

BAHREIN.*

(From Our Special Correspondent.)

May 27.

Important changes are now being made in the administration of the Bahrein Islands. For some time abuses have been creeping into the Government; the control of the Sheikh over some sections of the population has grown more and more feeble, and it was obvious that something would have to be done in the near future to set things on a more satisfactory basis. Events which occurred during the month of Ramadhan this year provided a suitable opportunity for interference, and the changes are now in train.

Fifty-five years ago, when Sheikh Isa al Khalifah was called on by the British Government to assume control of the administration of these islands, they were in the last stages of anarchy and disorder; pirates on the seas, and robberies, murders, and tribal quarrels on land produced a state of insecurity which rendered progress, whether commercial, agricultural, or moral, impossible. By dint of hard work and with the unfailing assistance of the British Government, Sheikh Isa succeeded in restoring order, and has allowed Bahrein to become a considerable trading centre. For this both the British Government and the people of Bahrein owe him a deep debt of gratitude.

Even so, however, the islands have not developed in the way that they should. The controlling hand of government has grown less and less visible. Abuses have crept into the Customs administration, some of the tribes have become almost independent under their own Sheikhs, have refused to pay the revenues due from them, and, when taken to task about it, have threatened to migrate in a body to the territories of Ibn Saoud or the Qatar Peninsula, while education, communications, and all works of public utility have been neglected and the revenues spent largely in maintaining in indolence the numerous members of the Al Khalifah family. At the same time the Sheikh, while unwilling to spend the revenues on works of public utility, has, with a conservatism born of old age, refused to grant sanction for the undertaking of such works by private enterprise, even though it was impressed on him that no expense would fall on him. Thus the provision of a pure fresh water supply and electric lighting in the town of Manamah, the big trade centre of the islands, has hitherto been impossible owing to the refusal of the Sheikh to grant the necessary sanction.

Early in Ramadhan a brawl occurred in Manamah between some Nejdis and the Persians who form a not inconsiderable element in the population of the town. The brawl in itself was not serious, and was stopped before any serious harm had been done. The seed of ill-feeling had been sown, however, and on May 10, arising out of a very paltry excuse, a much more serious affray took place, when several people were killed and many more or less seriously injured. On this occasion the absence of any Government control was very strongly marked. Bands of Nejdis and Persians rushed about the bazaars armed with lathis, and attacking anyone they met who belonged to the other side and was unarmed. Fortunately neither side had firearms, or the results would have been very much more serious. It appeared to be nobody's business, however, to try to bring the two sides to reason or to stop the fighting. Police there were none. True, there were a few nondescript persons locally known as police who actually were only municipal watchmen, but they would have been powerless to do anything even if they had wanted to do so. The fighting was left to go on as it would until a rumour that the British Political Agent was coming with the Indian sepoys, who form the Agency guard, brought both sides to their senses, and by the time the Political Agent arrived in his car the fighting had ceased. The Agency guard, which turned out merely as escort to the Political Agent, and not with any idea of interfering in what was purely a matter for the local Government to deal with, did not arrive until all was over except the removal of the dead and wounded.

It was then decided that radical changes must be made, and consequently Colonel Knox, Political Resident in the Persian Gulf, came to Bahrein to discuss the question with the Political Agent and the Sheikh. The result of his discussions, which lasted several days, were announced in a public majlis on May 26. Colonel Knox announced that Sheikh Isa had agreed, while remaining Sheikh of Bahrein, to withdraw entirely from all participation in the direction of affairs, this duty being performed for the future by his eldest son, Sheikh Hamad, assisted by his brother Sheikh Abdallah. After paying a tribute to the work of Sheikh Isa during the long period of his rule in these islands, Colonel Knox impressed upon Sheikh Hamad the urgent necessity of a more prudent expenditure of the public revenues than had been in vogue hitherto, advised him to set his teeth against unnecessary largesses and to pay attention to the needs of the public and the development of the territories under his rule. He then tendered some very outspoken advice to the various communities of which the population of the islands is composed. The Customs officials had, he said, been warned that certain abuses which had crept into the administration were to cease at once, and that they would be held personally responsible for any losses incurred through their omission to observe the regulations. To the Courts he gave a warning against allowing more or less influential people to try to interfere in cases before the courts by interceding on behalf of persons in whom they were interested. Qadhis were instructed that in cases where such interference came to their notice they were to hold up the case and report the matter either to Sheikh Hamad or to the Political Agent. The members of the Al Khalifah family were warned that they could no longer expect to be maintained in indolence out of the public revenues. Their numbers were now too big, and such diversion of public funds was not fair to the rest of the people. Those of them who had the ability and the will to assist in the administration of the islands might rest assured that they would receive ample reward. Those who lacked those qualifications could expect to get no more than a bare subsistence allowance. It was for the tribesmen, however, that his most outspoken words were addressed. Government, he said, was determined to have only one ruler in Bahrein, whom everyone must obey and to whom everyone must pay his fair share of taxation. If the tribes were not willing to accept that situation, and, as they had often threatened, decided to migrate, let them do so, and the sooner the better. They would not be allowed any longer to try to play off one ruler against another. Let them realise, however, that if they did go in a spirit of contumacy they must not be surprised if they found their lands and properties confiscated to the State and let to others. There would be no lack of tenants, and Government would not hesitate to take that step. The foreign community, which, he said, appeared to have prospered and increased enormously in recent years, would continue as heretofore to be under the jurisdiction of the Political Agent, and their present prosperity showed that they had every reason to be satisfied with their lot. To the Bahrein Shiahs he said that they had during recent years shown a tendency to resent the privileges possessed by the Sunnis, and to put forward statements of grievances. He had carefully examined their case, and was of opinion that, though there had undoubtedly been occasional instances of injustice and harsh treatment, yet, on the whole, they had been fairly treated and had little ground for justifiable complaint. They must, however, realise that the Government of Bahrein is Sunni, and, as a result, it is only natural that Sunni will to a certain extent be a privileged class —a position which the Shiahs must be content to face. Finally, he appealed to the merchants to make an attempt to put a stop to the malpractices which are current throughout the pearl trade, on which the prosperity of Bahrein depends more than on anything else. It is, he said, notorious that the Persian Gulf pearl industry is full of deceit and fraud from top to bottom, and he urged the merchants in their own interests and in order to preserve their good name to make some attempt to bring about reforms.

As a rule, the changes and Colonel Knox's speech have been well received, and hopes are entertained that Bahrein will now enter upon an era of development and prosperity which will rapidly make it the most important place in the Persian Gulf. Well served by steamships, which call at regular intervals, and centrally situated to serve as a distributing centre for the markets of the Hasa and Central Arabia, it has the means of expansion ready to hand, and needs only an enlightened and progressive Government to enable it to attain a very important position.

BRITAIN AND ISLAM.

At a luncheon given in his honour at the Holborn Restaurant, by Mr. Alec Tyler, on July 3, Dr. S. M. Zwemer, editor of the "Moslem World," gave a profoundly interesting address on the relations between Great Britain and the Mohammedan world. Dr. Zwemer, an American of Dutch origin, has lived for thirty-three years under the British flag, and during the greater part of this time has interested himself in Moslem peoples. In the course of his remarks he pleaded, in the interests both of the British Empire and of Mohammedans, of whom 107 millions lived under British rule, for a better understanding between both parties. He did not ignore the difficulties in the way, There were four grounds of estrangement:—(1) Political, exemplified by the tenets of the Sacred Law, which commends, even when it does not make obligatory, the treatment of "infidels" as inferiors; (2) social; Moslems are offended as much by our abolition of slavery which is allowed by the Koran, as by our attitude towards intoxicating liquors, which are forbidden by the Koran; (3) the movement for self-determination or independence; and (4) the Khalifate question. Great Britain has a tremendous responsibility towards the Mohammedans, and Dr. Zwemer believed that God had destined the Empire to work out their future for them. In spite of his love for the Mohammedan world—"I feel," he said, "for these people with their disappointed hopes after the War, feeling that they have lost their all"—Dr. Zwemer does not approve of British policy in the grant of independence to Egypt, which he does not believe will prove to be in the best interests of the Egyptians.

Sir Valentine Chirol also spoke, and while paying tribute to the splendid faith which actuated Dr. Zwemer, said that for his own part he saw more clearly the difficulties in the way of the goal held out to them until Mohammedan ideals were brought into harmony with British ideals.

Mr. Alec Tyler presided at the luncheon, and was warmly thanked by Mr. Basil Matthews, Editor of "Outward Bound," for having enabled those present to meet Dr. Zwemer.

THE CENTRAL ASIAN SOCIETY.

The annual dinner of the Central Asian Society was held in the Edward VII. Rooms of the Victoria Hotel on July 4, and was attended by some 130 members and friends. Sir Maurice de Bunsen, G.C.M.G., G.C.V.O., Chairman of Council, presided. The guests of the Society were Viscount Milner and Lord Carnock, and among others present were:—Lady de Bunsen, Lord Lamington, Field-Marshal Sir Arthur Barrett, General Sir Edmund Barrow and Lady Barrow, Sir Michael O'Dwyer and Lady O'Dwyer, Sir John Hewett and Sir Ali Imam (as guests of Colonel F. E. Fremantle), Sir Charles Yate, M.P., General Sir Raleigh and Lady Egerton, Sir George Barnes, Sir Alexander Cobbe, Sir Claude Hill, General Grove, Sir George Forbes, Sir Henry and Lady Bax-Ironside, Sir Percy and Lady Sykes, Miss Ella Sykes, Sir William Willcox, Sir Edward and Lady Penton, Sir Thomas and Lady Bennett, Sir William Geary, Sir Walter Bond, Colonel and Mrs. A. C. Yate, Lady Roche, General and Mrs. Fryer, General Bailward, Commodore D. Norris, and Colonel and Mrs. C. B. Stokes.

In proposing the toast of the "Guests of the Society," the Chairman pointed out that people in Great Britain were bound to take a great and increasing interest in Asiatic affairs. Whether all that was said about the gulf growing between non-white people and the white people of the world and about Pan-Islamism and Asiatic nationalism were true or not, it behoved this country to study the Asia question, prepared to meet it, as it developed, in the same sympathetic spirit that it had always shown towards the legitimate aspirations of Asiatic peoples.

Lord Milner, replying to the toast, said that he was going to avail himself of the latitude with which the Society interpreted its own title to speak about Palestine. He was concerned about the trend of public opinion in this country with regard to the British position in Palestine. When he returned a year ago from a visit there he was shocked to find so many of his friends in the doldrums about Palestine, and since then the gloom, if anything, had deepened. Certainly difficulties had to be encountered in that country, and it was in no way a bed of roses for the British Administration; but if we were to come out of every country which was not a bed of roses, the confines of the British Empire would be very considerably reduced. Explaining the circumstances which compelled him on a visit of pleasure and recuperation to examine conditions in Palestine, he went on to say that he came to the conclusion that the Arabs were protesting, not against something which had happened or was happening, but against something that they had been told was going to happen. Arab non-co-operation was a great embarrassment to the British Administration, but the worst way out of it would be for us to wobble in the face of an agitation which did not rest upon any legitimate grievances. As a warm sympathiser with Arab aspirations, he thought Arabs of Palestine ought to be satisfied with Mr. Ormsby-Gore's recent declaration of British policy, and he believed they would be satisfied when they found that the British Government was as good as its word; that the coming of the Jews did not involve any injury to them, and that their coming did promote the development of Palestine in a way in which it could not otherwise be promoted for decades, even if ever. The position was serious, but not insuperable. We must not let it fluster us, but go on quietly showing that we were exercising a just and impartial administration. It might be that the Jews and Arabs would never learn to love one another, but that was not to say that they would never be able to live together in the same country under a fair and impartial administration. If Palestine was not to become another storm centre it was absolutely essential that there should be a disinterested Government, keeping peace, not only between Jew and Arab, between Moslem and Christian, but also between different denominations of Christians.

A well-earned tribute to the retiring secretary, Colonel A. C. Yate, who in the course of five years' devoted work had revived the Society and raised its membership from two hundred to seven hundred, was paid by Sir Edward Penton in an admirable speech dealing with the Society's activities. Colonel Yate, whose health was drunk was musical honours, replied, acknowledging the help that he had been given in the rebuilding of the Society, and reminded his audience that Lord Curzon's declaration still held good that the great work of the Society is to be done by its members in the vast field of action which British stakes and interests in the Near and Middle East lay open to them.

THE EARTHQUAKE IN PERSIA.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—As President of the Persia Society I have received the following telegram from His Majesty's Minister at Teheran:—"Recent earthquake at Turbati-Haidari has caused real and widespread distress. Relief contribution from British sources would be welcome proof of British sympathy. Could fund be opened under your auspices, and public invited to subscribe? Shah has opened local relief under his own patronage."

The Persia Society cordially endorses this appeal and will be very glad to forward donations, which should be addressed to the Honorary Treasurer of the Society, c,o. Imperial Bank of Persia, 25, Abchurch Lane, E.C.4.—I am, etc.,

THE BULGARIAN SITUATION.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—It is impossible for me to read all the papers which have spoken on the recent change of government in Sofia, and more so to attempt to correct the general misapprehension under which all labour on the subject. In your issue of the 28th instant you give extracts from articles in the Nation, the Glasgow Herald and the New Statesman. All the writers of these articles have failed to understand the real situation in Bulgaria created by Stambolisky's régime, as also the one which the new Government is establishing and will establish. One writer says: "Woe to Bulgaria if it falls under the guidance of the Thracian and Macedonian irredentists"; another says: "Woe to Bulgaria if the peasants, followers of Stambolisky, rose successfully against the intelligentzia, and the upstart bourgeois with western varnish"; a third sees in the satisfaction of Turkey with the change—satisfaction because it promises a change in Bulgarian policy—a change of direction towards the Macedonian question. They all foresee internal danger to Bulgaria, and danger to the peace in the Balkans, as any change in her policy as regards Serbia is bound to lead to a conflict.

In the first place the Thracian and Macedonian irredentists, so called, have never dominated and never will dominate Bulgaria. There has been as much on one side as on the other. They are good Bulgarians and will not involve Bulgaria in unnecessary risks promising only ruin for her. They have, of course, the sympathy of the Bulgarians of Bulgaria, but they are determined to work out their destiny by themselves. Their cause is righteous, as one writer says, and they are striving to secure to their oppressed countrymen what the treaties have granted them. Who can blame them?

To talk of intelligentzia with western varnish, and upstart bourgeois on the one hand and the peasant class on the other, is nonsense as regards Bulgaria. The first is inapplicable, the second is an invention of Stambolisky; it was his unwarranted slogan. Stambolisky belonged both to the so-called intelligentzia and bourgeois, for of such as himself are these two classes. All past governments have given their best attention to the prosperity of agriculture, to that of the peasant. It could not be otherwise. Those governments ruled by the will of the peasant vote, eighty-two per cent. of the entire population. Until the demagogue Stambolisky arose nobody had dreamed of a bourgeois party in Bulgaria. Stambolisky's power was founded upon a delusion; this delusion has vanished with his disappearance. There is no fear of any reaction on the part of the peasant class against the recent change; there exists no reason for it.

Stambolisky's boisterous career, most ruinous for the country, has never been appreciated at its proper value abroad. He is spoken of as a fallen idol. He was evidently such abroad, but not for his country. Ungovernable tyrant is the correct word, as regards his country itself. He is credited abroad with great services to his country. Anybody else would have done as much and more, but without his bluster and the almost irreparable damage he has occasioned the country he was supposed to serve. No other Bulgarian statesman could have followed any other policy; there was no other policy to prefer. Stambolisky's policy was and is the only possible one for Bulgaria. Such is the pass to which Bulgaria's misfortunes have brought her. Bulgaria is not in a situation to provoke any of her neighbours, she cannot but work and strive for good relations with them.

But everyone says—How about the Macedonian question? How will the new Government treat it? The Macedonian question concerns, in the first place, Serbia; Serbia rules there, and Serbia is strong while Bulgaria is weak. Serbia is ever reminding the world of the obligations Bulgaria has taken upon herself by treaty. A similar treaty has imposed obligations upon Serbia. Bulgaria has done her duty to the utmost, a recognised fact; has Serbia done as much? Serbia has only to fulfil her obligations to the minorities in her new territories, and there will be no Macedonian oppression. But no, Serbia has kindled a conflagration in Macedonia, is feeding it every day, and expects, even demands, that Bulgaria should slave to extinguish it! It is unjust, inhuman. Serbia is four times bigger than Bulgaria, her army is ten times as large as the Bulgarian: surely she should be in a position to watch and to guard her frontiers, and insure peace and order within her territory. Why blame Bulgaria for Serbia's shortcomings?

The easy success of the revolution, which has annihilated Stambolisky's régime, is attributed to the action of the military; but for such it might have failed. Of course, some sort of organisation was necessary to overthrow this régime; the military organisation was selected as best at hand. But every one of the soldiers is a peasant; how is it that they acted with such determination? For a long time past Stambolisky had lost hold of the country. He remained in power by the terror he had organised with all the bad and corrupted elements in the country. These at the decisive moment failed him, as they were bound to do. The peasant class as also the bourgeois class were tired of him; all had suffered from his rule, and all hated him as a violent upstart, demagogue and corrupted tyrant. And he has collapsed, to be regretted by no honest man.

The new Government's first work is to restore peace and order where anarchy ruled, to give confidence to the people in its rulers, security of life and property which had ceased to exist so long as Stambolisky was master.

Stambolisky's colleagues are under arrest, not because they are dangerous men, but because while in power they passed unconstitutional laws to legalise committed crimes.—I am, etc.,

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

Irak and the Nejd.

The Baghdad correspondent of the Morning Post contributed to the issue of July 6 an article upon "British Policy in Arabia." After describing the extraordinary intensity and ambition of Ibn Sa'oud and his organisation of the Ikhwan, he points out the internal danger threatened by the Brothers:—

> Efficient though they may be as a fighting unit, however, the Ikhwan are in other respects a source of weakness and danger to the State. Removed from their natural surroundings and made to live in settled colonies, they are out of their element. They cannot under such circumstances follow their ancestral occupation of camel breeding, for this demands a nomad life. At the same time the supply of water at the new colonies is not sufficient to enable them all to employ themselves in agriculture. The result is that most of them toil not neither do they spin, and Ibn Sa'oud is compelled to maintain them to a very large extent out of the revenues of the country. This constitutes a very heavy drain on the resources of a country where cultivation is scanty and as a rule extremely precarious, and where the taxable capacity of the people is strictly limited. When the Ikhwan are actually in the field they are fed and maintained entirely by the Sultan and by any loot they can lay their hands on.

A large standing army of the nature of the Ikhwan must, moreover, be constantly employed if it is to be kept under control; Ibn Sa'oud's views are obliged, therefore, to be permanently turning towards fresh conquests. Further, there is little love lost between the settled population of the towns and oases of Arabia and the Ikhwan, so that—

> Ibn Sa'oud will have to walk very warily if he is to prevent the weapon which he has forged from turning in his hand. As long as he himself remains alive his own personality may suffice to hold things together, for both the Ikhwan and the settled population are warmly devoted to him at present; but there is little doubt that when he dies things will revert again to their previous chaotic state.

British policy in Arabia, meanwhile, is bolstering up this militant fanaticism. The cost of living in Arabia is high, the merchants groan against the heavy taxes, and the removal of the Bedouin from their normal pursuit of camel breeding will not only reduce the export of animals, but will make impossible payment for exports. It is to this position that Britain holds the key:—

> The truth is that Ibn Sa'oud is maintaining himself and his standing army by means of the big subsidy which is paid to him by the British Government, not, as far as can be seen, for any assistance which he gives or indeed can give, but presumably to restrain him from attacking Iraq, which is ruled over by the son of his most hated foe, the King of the Hejaz. But it is merely a result of British policy that he is now in a position to make any serious threat against Iraq. During the Great War the actual assistance which Ibn Sa'oud rendered was negligible. There are those who believe, however, that any threat to Iraq from Ibn Sa'oud may be largely discounted, at any rate for the time being. It is true that Iraq professed to be greatly alarmed when, in the spring of 1922, a party of the Ikhwan descended on some of the Iraq tribes out in the desert pastures; but the fear was to a large extent assumed in the hope that the Government would be moved to reissue to the tribes the rifles collected after the rising of 1920. Occasional raids may, it is true, be made on the settled area, but a raiding party of any size is extremely vulnerable, and with the advent of aeroplanes the security hitherto afforded by rapid retreat into the desert has been lost. In addition, Great Britain has a very effective weapon in her hands to be used if Ibn Sa'oud persists in a policy of aggression, namely, the blockade.

It will be seen, says the writer of this article, that British policy is contradictory, for while on the one hand it declares its intention of setting up as soon as possible an independent State in Irak, on the other it is paying Ibn Sa'oud a large subsidy, the net result of which is that we have to keep British forces in Irak! It is in the power of blockade that our remedy lies:—

> To argue that if Ibn Sa'oud takes any aggressive action against Iraq we can bring him to heel by withholding his subsidy misses the point. Such action might conceivably be effective if it were certain that it would be carried out, but no stoppage of the subsidy was made in 1922 when he raided the Iraq tribes, and in any case the payment is an uncalled for waste of money when in the blockade we have a weapon which would be no less effective, and when there is every reason to believe that by discontinuing entirely the payment of the subsidy we shuld make it impossible for him to maintain the formidable force which he now has, and in this way the potential danger to Iraq would be considerably reduced.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London,
Tuesday Morning.

At Last.

Peace with Turkey comes after such months of anticipation—and disappointment—that it cannot be expected to arouse the full tide of enthusiasm that would otherwise have been excited by the news (incomplete though the settlement is, seeing that the main obstacle to an agreement—the question of the Turkish Debt coupons—has merely been shelved). But though the business community has accepted the development quietly, it is none the less fully aware of the importance of the success of the Lausanne negotiations. It means the removal of a barrier to trade development throughout the whole of the Near and Middle East which has existed ever since the Armistice, clogging enterprise, hindering progress, and making the exchanges much worse than they would otherwise be. Coming at the present juncture when the authorities have been warning us that an even leaner period lies ahead of us, the news is particularly welcome, and though, owing to the repercussions of the Reparations crisis, the effects of the development may not be immediately perceptible, the fact remains that the signature of peace at Lausanne will represent the most considerable advance towards the normal made since 1918.

Four per Cent.

The alteration in the Bank rate from 3 to 4 per cent. was fully expected in the City in view of the conditions prevailing in the money market. It is interesting to note that it is the first change for almost a year, the last alteration being on July 13, and the principal reason for it is to be found in the extent to which in recent months overseas borrowers have been taking advantage of the position in this market, where they have been able to obtain money on cheaper terms than elsewhere. America has been prominent in this direction of late, while the more attractive rates of interest obtainable in that country have led to the investment of British funds there, these two causes being mainly responsible for the recent movement of the dollar against us. This tendency should be checked by the increased Bank rate, and if 4 per cent. is inadequate for this purpose, there need be no surprise if another half-point or so is added. The Stock Exchange has, of course, felt the effect of the change, which is bound to act as a corrective of the unreal level of values attained by gilt-edged securities, though there is not likely to be any pronounced downward movement until something approaching a real revival of trade calls for the financing of business on a large scale.

The Cotton Position.

Judging from the latest figures of the American cotton crop, we seem to be appreciably nearer the point at which there may be a real shortage of cotton. Whether there will be so or not depends entirely on the extent to which world conditions permit of the development of the demand for cotton goods. With a normal demand a shortage would be a fait accompli, but we are very far from that position, though the settlement with Turkey is going to make an immense difference, and we may yet have cause to regret our dilatoriness in developing supplies of cotton within the Empire. As we know, great things have been accomplished in the last few years in an attempt to make up for lost time, and granted two or three more years' respite, Lancashire may be in a fairly safe position as regards supplies; but if, as may justly be anticipated, the current year sees a general settlement of the problems that have been troubling the world, then there will be a great development in the demand for cotton for all purposes, with the corollary that Lancashire will have to face soaring prices or go short.

Montenegrin Debt Service.

The statement that it was proposed to resume interest payments on the Montenegrin Five per Cent. Loan, to which I referred recently in these columns, would appear to have led holders of the bonds to believe that coupons falling due on July 1 would be met. In view of the short interval between that date and the occasion on which the reference in question was made it was scarcely reasonable to anticipate anything of the kind, and I can see no occasion in the circumstances for the surprise expressed because funds had not been transmitted for the service of the debt. The bondholders have had an exasperating experience in waiting for their money, but now that they have had a definite statement on the question from a Minister, what further period of delay there may be (and one assumes that the coupons will be met on the next date) should, at any rate, be devoid of uncertainty.

P. and O. Banking Corporation.

The profits earned by the P. and O. Banking Corporation for the year ended March 31 are somewhat below the level reached the previous year, which is not surprising in view of the adverse conditions with which the Eastern banks have had to contend, and the actual total of £139,388, as against £159,300, must be adjudged very satisfactory in the circumstances. The dividend is maintained at 5½ per cent., a fact which suggests the confidence of the directors in the outlook. The business of the bank, it may be noted, has continued to expand. The total of the balance-sheet has increased by nearly £10,000,000, while the deposits have increased to £10,360,705 from £6,316,930.

ROUMANIA.

Bucharest, July 3.

A French Protest.

Before Parliament rose in the middle of June for the summer vacation it passed into law all the important bills mentioned in last month's letter, i.e., (1) the measure for the Roumanisation of the Reshitza Company; (2) the law against illicit speculation; and (3) the law regarding the payment of debts by Roumanian importers to foreign creditors. The last measure elicited a strong protest from the French commercial representative in Bucharest which was published in the Argus. He considered that it was entirely unjust that the French creditors should be obliged to accept an arrangement in the making of which they took no part. Not only, indeed, were they not parties to the London and Manchester arrangements, but it is an open secret that they considered the terms proposed to them by the Roumanian delegates of the debtors who visited Paris on their way to London thoroughly unsatisfactory, and refused to make a collective agreement. Discussions upon this subject are likely to continue for some time.

New Prices for Petroleum Products.

Two other important measures have been passed. One of these fixes new and considerably higher prices for the sale of petroleum products on the home market and the other relates to the liquidation of ex-enemy property. As regards the petroleum prices the oil companies appear to be fairly satisfied with the new regulations. From the point of view of the consumer, however, the immediate effect, as regards the distribution of lamp oil in Bucharest, has been that the hawkers who are the chief distributors of kerosene to the ordinary private consumer, went on strike, as they contended that the commission of fifty bani per kilogram allowed to them was not sufficient to make it worth their while, and small quantities of kerosene could only be had by sending specially to the depôts, a very costly way of procuring it. The prices now fixed are as follows in lei per kilogram; ex-refinery and not including taxes, those previously in force being given in brackets:—Aviation benzine 8.50 (5.00), light benzine (petrol) 6.00 (3.50), heavy benzine 3.50 (2.00), white spirit (Washington) 3.50 (2.00), refined lamp oil 3.00 (1.50), gas oil 2.50 (1.50), residues: (a) For delivery to State, district or commune up to 365,000 tons yearly, 1.30 (.70) (b) For delivery to factories, etc. 2.00 (1.00).

Though the law concerning the liquidation of enemy property has actually been passed and has been published in the Official Monitor it is difficult to understand how it can be carried into effect, as it appears to give the Government power to appropriate all ex-enemy property and interests, even if these have already been freed from sequestration by the Roumanian authorities and legally disposed of to new owners.

The Government and the Export Trade.

The Government has evidently begun to realise that serious measures must be adopted to increase exports so as, in some measure at least, to reduce the large adverse balance of trade. The increase in the price of wheat is intended as a step in this direction. Another measure has just been passed—which will be of interest to British egg importers—provides that the export of eggs shall in future be free from May 1 until November 1 annually. It also permits the export of most kinds of cattle and sheep, but not horses or bulls. Transylvania has hitherto suffered greatly from the prohibition of the export of cattle, as this has long been one of the principal branches of trade in that province. The cause of the prohibition was a shortage of butcher's meat. The egg trade is done chiefly with Bessarabia where several British houses have had extensive trading connections for generations.

M. Bratianu's Visit.

According to the Argus the main objects of M. Vintila Bratianu in visiting England and France are: (1) to try to clear up the question of the war reparations due to Roumania (it will be remembered that his brother M. Ion Bratianu was always dissatisfied with the one per cent. allotted to his country); (2) to find, in the form of a loan, the capital required by the State to collaborate with private Roumanian capital in the development of the timber industry, the fisheries, etc.; and (3) to explain the terms and conditions under which the Government is willing to permit the participation of foreign capital in Roumanian enterprises.

BRITISH EMPIRE EXHIBITION.

The Standing Administrative Committee of the British Empire Exhibition has issued a report on the progress made between March 1 and May 31. The construction of the Indian Pavilion, it is stated, has already been commenced, and it is expected that this will be completed by the middle of October next. It is interesting to note that one-sixth of the total space of the Indian Pavilion has been taken by ruling Princes of Indian Native States. The Sudan has decided to participate with the East African Group, and has applied for 2,500 sq. ft. of space, and proposes to spend £2,400. A definite proposal has been received from Palestine (to include also the representation of Cyprus) for about 4,800 sq. ft. The representatives of Palestine and Cyprus with their architect have inspected the site offered to them between the West African and the South African Sections, and on certain conditions are prepared to accept it. Malta has applied for an area of 5,000 sq. ft. on which it proposes to erect a pavilion covering 3,000 sq. ft. The Maltese Pavilion will probably be erected on a site to the south-east of the East African Section. The expenditure authorised by the Maltese Government is £8,000.

The Cunard Company announces that Mr. F. Litchfield, for reasons of health, relinquished on June 30 the position of manager of the company's Southampton office. Mr. Charles E. Cotterell, hitherto an assistant manager of the company in Liverpool, has been appointed to succeed Mr. Litchfield.

The attention of British holders of coupons and drawn bonds of the Bulgarian Six per Cent. Loan of 1892 is drawn to the notice published on October 27, 1921, offering payment in French francs converted in sterling at the sight rate of exchange on Paris on the day of presentation, less tax. Coupons and drawn bonds due January, 1916, to July, 1923, may now be deposited at the Imperial Ottoman Bank, 25, Austin Friars, E.C.

British Consular Reports.

Efforts have been made by the Government to encourage the growing of wheat. The maximum price of 25,000 lei is increased by a premium of 5,000 lei paid when the wheat is delivered over to a miller, and in addition a premium of 200 lei is offered per hectare of autumn wheat sown. This does not by any means approach the cost of ploughing and sowing, which is approximately as follows (in lei per hectare):—Ploughing, 300; seed, 800; sowing, 100; harrowing, 100; total, 1,300. Then the Government subsidy is paid in two instalments—one on April 1 and the second on July 1, 1923, so that the above expense, and also the spring labour cost, is to be incurred before anything is received by the farmer.

Imports.

During 1922 a small quantity of coal was imported. It will be many years before British coal imports can resume their pre-war importance. British cotton yarns continued to be imported into Roumania in 1922, although, apparently, not in the same quantities as in 1920 and 1921. British importers complained that it was not possible to dispose of cotton yarns in Roumania at a price in lei sufficient to cover sterling costs and profits. Sales were nevertheless made, and the prices realised for British goods were at all times higher than those for Italian or other yarns, although the liquidation of stocks kept the market somewhat under its normal course.

It is very difficult for the ultimate consumer of yarns to understand the reasons for the rapid increases in price in lei, which necessarily follow upon the international course of exchange, and there is a tendency to defer purchases as far as possible in the hope that prices will revert to a lower level. This leads to a hand-to-mouth system of trading which has gradually become general, not only in the yarn business, but also in practically all classes of goods imported from Western Europe, and is one of the difficulties which will confront British shippers to this part of the world for some time to come. A hand-to-mouth system of buying means smaller and more frequent purchases, and, coupled as it has been during last year with a tendency to pay cash, or on terms approximating to cash, it must be regarded as a healthy sign, although to the British exporter small orders mean larger overhead charges, and necessarily a diminution in the bulk shipped during the course of the year.

It has been practically impossible to do any business since the Armistice in the larger agricultural machines. Not only have the prices of these machines risen in the United Kingdom, but the depreciation of the leu has been such that to-day something like 100 times their pre-war price in lei must be paid by the customer. It takes some time for a buyer to become accustomed to such prices. Here, however, several importing agents state that as regards small machinery, it is now becoming possible to sell on cash terms, whereas, prior to the war, this trade with Roumania was always conducted on credit terms averaging over three years. In small machines there seems to be a possible opening for British trade, but in tools and implements the market has been taken by Central European manufacturers.

Motor-car tyres have been imported in 1922, as in previous years since the war, in large quantities, but British manufacturers are not represented to any extent in this trade. Quite recently one British firm has appointed an active agent in Bucharest, and the agent seems optimistic regarding prospects of business. In this branch prices asked for British manufactures have been materially greater than for comparable French tyres. There seems no reason why British manufacturers should not be able to sell a tyre of comparative quality at similar cost to those sent here, say, from France.

In wire ropes and belting the United Kingdom manufacturers hold the market for quality, but both in time of delivery and in price they fall short of foreign competitors, especially German and Austrian. Some of the British manufacturers are represented by active agents, and, considering the state of the market and the amount of business being done, a considerable quantity of the goods sold came from the United Kingdom. Tin and terne plates have been sold, although in smaller quantities than in previous years. Soft iron for use in the manufacture of nails has also been supplied. These goods are sold for cash by the importer in Roumania, but he seems to have found some difficulty in paying cash in sterling for the goods he imports.

The report of the P. and O. Banking Corporation, Ltd., for the year ended March 31 states that the net profits for the year, after providing for taxation, bad and doubtful debts, and valuing investments at market rates, amount to £139,388; with the addition of £14,043 brought forward from last year, the available balance is £153,431, from which the directors have placed to reserve the sum of £25,000, making a total reserve of £115,000. Out of the balance of £128,431 they propose to pay a dividend of 5½ per cent., less tax, absorbing £113,251, leaving £15,180 to be carried forward.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Firmer Undertone.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ended June 29, state:—

Since our last report the futures market has remained practically unchanged, but the undertone has been rather firmer. The turnover of business has been moderate, and has consisted almost exclusively of transfers from near to distant positions. The difference between July and November Sakellarides has widened considerably, and at one time touched practically 200 points. The weakness of July Sakellarides is mainly due to the fact that the great majority of the existing stocks is tenderable cotton of grades fully good fair to good, which naturally weighs on the position in view of the fear of dockets. The renewed strength of Ashmouni futures is due to a great extent to speculative manipulation helped by the present shortage of supplies. Egyptian in Liverpool has not improved despite the continuation of large daily spot sales. The fact is that there too the bulk of the stocks consist of higher grade cottons, which is apparently more or less all covered with contracts; as the demand for these grades is negligible, it is but natural to find that no disposition exists to take up dockets. The fact that our prices are so extraordinarily cheap compared to American coupled with the daily strengthening of the statistical position prevent us from taking a bearish view of the market; on the contrary, our opinion is that as soon as the July position is disposed of all factors warrant for the close of the season a higher level of prices. This week's receipt amounted to 5,331 krs., and the total since September 1 now stands at 6,613,560 krs. Exports have this week amounted to 72,252 krs., and the stock now stands at 1,313,655 krs., against 1,380,576 krs. a week ago and 1,856,945 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—Minet-el-Bassal has been more active this week, and we have had an improved demand from abroad. Sales amount to about 7,300 B/s, of which we estimate 5,300 B/s Sakellarides, 1,850 B/s Uppers, and 150 B/s various. Attracted, no doubt, by the cheapness of our cotton compared with other growths, spinners have bought more freely than for some time past Sakellarides.—All styles have been dealt in, and more attention has been paid to the better grades than for several weeks. Below fully good fair cotton becomes daily scarcer and dearer, but there is quite a good selection in the better styles. Prices are generally without change, except fair and fully fair, which are dearer than last week.

Uppers.—All grades have changed hands with the grades above fully good fair in most request. Prices generally do not show much change, but are inclined to ease.

Brown.—A small business has been done at slightly easier rates.

White.—A retail business has been done at hardening rates.

Crop 1923.—There is nothing special to report on the new crop, which is progressing normally.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Market Weak.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended July 4:—

Spot cotton has again been in good request, and, assisted by some fairly large purchases on Russian account in the early part of the week, the daily sales show an average of 1,700 bales. During the first few days the trend of prices proved to be somewhat uncertain, the American crop condition report causing a certain amount of uneasiness prior to its arrival last Monday. Afterwards, a downward tendency developed in both markets, which is still in evidence as we write. As we predicted in our report last week, the setback suffered in the upper basis was of short duration, the position being now reversed again, i.e., uppers have hardened and Sakellaridis is slightly weaker.

Upper cotton, indeed, has figured very largely in the inquiry this week, and the additional supplies which have lately been brought into sight have had but little effect on the market. Most transactions took place at from 16⅜d: to 16⅝d. per lb. The Russian buying referred to above was divided, as on previous occasions, into two classes (1) purchases of F.G.F. Sakellaridis at about 100 on contracts, and (2) purchases of good to fine Sakellaridis, for which it is understood about 18d. was paid. The general inquiry for Sakellaridis has been concerned mostly with the "100 on" cotton, though here and there a distinct leaning towards the better cotton at more money was discernable. Low cotton, 10d. to 12d., still meets with many inquiries, but we have reason to believe that actual sales are only moderate in number. In Sudan cotton only a limited business has taken place; Tokar Sakel, owing to the high prices asked, is neglected by would-be buyers, and it appears that holders will either have to revise their selling limits or face the prospects of holding their cotton for an indefinite period.

White and brown cottons have met with but little inquiry from the trade. C.i.f. business has been very quiet. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 30th ult. were returned as 7,160 bales. Total sales 8,500 bales (includes 350 Sudan). Quotations of Sakellaridis are reduced 40 points, those of upper and brown 25 points. F.G.F. Sakel to-day 15.90d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Little Change in Conditions.

The "Manchester Cotton Trade Review" of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended July 7 states:—

Little variation has taken place in general conditions during the past week, though if any difference at all is discernable it is in the right direction. Possibly the hope of cheaper cotton based on the increased acreage reported by the American Official Bureau has put some heart into the market, for there is no denying the fact that the best chance of overseas trade activity lies in lower prices for cotton goods. Although some markets overseas are known to be getting very short, they appear in no hurry to buy.

As so frequently reported of late, the Yarn market is very depressed. Although orders for fair lines are reported here and there, the general experience has been one of stagnation. A ballot has been taken regarding the continuance or otherwise of the "minimum price" scheme, and the result is awaited with considerable interest. The unpalatable fact is that the spinners who have done any business at all worth mentioning are those who have not adhered to the scheme; those who have been loyal have, with few exceptions, had practically empty order books. The general demand for export continues slow, though once again the Levant has placed orders for "extra hards." In a general way quotations may be said to be about ½d. per lb. lower than last week.

Cloth.—Slightly improved enquiry from India has been noted, possibly due to the better news regarding the Monsoon. Small orders have been placed by Calcutta, Bombay and Madras, mainly for light fabrics. Rather better reports are to hand from China, where the sales at the auctions are said to have realised improved prices, but Chinese importers evidently do not believe in present quotations and are waiting for lower figures before placing orders for new goods. The protracted negotiations at Lausanne still exert an unfavourable influence on trade with the Near East, which continues small. A slight improvement is reported in transactions with South America, and under the influence of the better weather the home trade is a little brisker

Raw Cotton.—The forecast of the new crop is not particularly good as regards condition, but the acreage under cultivation constitutes a record. Quotations during the past week have fluctuated a good deal, with falls of 25-30 points on each of the first three days of the week, but with a reaction on Thursday and Friday. Closing prices are as follows:—American Fully Middling, 15.77d.; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 15.75d.

ROUMANIA'S WHEAT HARVEST.

Reduced Yield in Prospect.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

Bucharest, July 3.

Details have now been published of the total sowings of this year's harvest, a long article by M. Carabella, an official at the Ministry of Agriculture, having appeared in the Argus of June 15, giving approximate figures. From these it would appear that the total area sown with wheat is 400,000 hectares less than last year, viz., 1,800,000 hectares of winter wheat as against 2,000,000 last year, and 450,000 hectares of spring wheat as against 650,000 hectares last year. It would seem that M. Carabella is seriously perturbed at this considerable decline in the wheat sowings, which he maintains cannot be justified by any natural causes. He points out that the wheat sowings in Bessarabia alone produced 32,000 wagons of wheat in 1922, and that this was sufficient to sow an area of 1,500,000 hectares, and suggests that this might have been used for distribution to the peasants in districts where there was a shortage of seed corn. Unfortunately no such steps were taken and in any case the low price for wheat fixed by the Government offered no inducement to agriculturalists to grow this crop, as they could get higher prices for barley, oats, and maize.

M. Carabella states that the normal area of wheat sowings for Greater Roumania would be about 4,000,000 hectares, and he considers that no effort would be too great, and no means should be spared, to attain this figure. In his view the price of wheat should be raised at least fifty per cent., as against barley, oats, and maize. Since his article was written a law has been passed raising the maximum price of wheat from 25,000 lei to 45,000 lei per wagon of 10,000 kilograms, but, as pointed out by Dr. G. Antipa in his very able pamphlet entitled "The Progressive General Paralysis of our National Economy and its Remedies," the world price at which Roumania's neighbours—Bulgaria and Hungary export, is 75,000 lei per wagon, so that even the new price is not very encouraging to wheat growers, especially as they are still liable to have part of their wheat crops commandeered by the Government for the use of the Army, etc., at a lower price. As regards the harvest prospects for this year the wheat crops are looking very well, in some districts even remarkably so, and the production per hectare should be at least as good as last year, although in view of the smaller area sown the production as a whole will doubtless be considerably less. All the other crops are equally promising, and have benefited greatly by the heavy rains which have fallen during June.

AGRICULTURAL CONDITIONS IN IRAK.

The Agricultural Bulletin of Irak gives the following particulars of conditions during the month ended May 15:—

In Lower Irak during the first half of April the weather was unusually cool, thereby retarding the germination of spring-sown crops, especially cotton. During the second half of the month there was an appreciable rise in the daily temperatures, which hastened the maturity of winter cereals. A few light showers of rain fell. In Upper Irak heavy thunderstorms, accompanied by hail, did fairly considerable damage to the standing crop of wheat and barley. The late spring rainfall in this area has been unusually heavy. In general, the season has been favourable to the wheat and barley crop. The average yield is expected to fall short of that of the previous season, which was exceptionally favourable.

A serious breach on the left bank of the Hindiyah branch of the Euphrates has swamped an area of standing crop of wheat and barley, roughly estimated at 10,000 acres. At the time of writing a still more serious breach at the head of the recently constructed Saklawiyah Canal has resulted in a very large area of standing crop being inundated. The extent of the damage done cannot at present be estimated.

Cotton sown during the last half of March and also from the third week of April germinated well and is making good progress. That sown during the first half of April germinated indifferently, and much of this latter area was resown. The stand of plants at present is good. An appreciable all-round improvement is noticeable in the attention given to cotton cultivation by growers. The total quantity of seed sold is 141,524 lb.

The quality of silk cocoons produced this season is good. The total quantity of eggs sold was 262 ounce packets. At Ba'qubah and Kadhimain pupils of elementary schools paid periodic visits to the silk breeding houses of the Agricultural Department and were given instruction in the rearing of silkworms and treatment of cocoons. The usual diseases were identified, but they are not so serious as materially to affect the yield. The silk work that has been done during the past two seasons has now arrived at a stage when it can be best undertaken by a commercial agency. It has been definitely proved that first-class cocoons can be produced under local conditions. The industry in its initial stage deserves generous treatment from the Government. Machinery is in course of erection for handling the flax crop grown experimentally by a few landowners. A Japanese variety of flax has given best results in the current season as far as the yield of straw per acre is concerned. In the main varietal test with wheat at the Government Experimental Farm, Rustam, out of the fifteen varieties under experiment, eleven have been discarded, as they are addicted to rust disease. The remaining four will be propagated next season. Soil analyses and the study of insect pests and diseases of plants continue satisfactorily. Ten varieties of sugar-cane, of which five were selected as chewing canes and five for sugar extraction, have been received from Madras and distributed to landowners in Basrah.

The total exports of grain up to the end of March from the 1921-1922 crop were 155,000 tons. Preliminary reports on the Basrah date crop indicate that conditions are favourable to an average crop. As the season advanced it transpired that the outbreak of locusts in the Mosul area was much more extensive than originally anticipated. The cereal situation in this area is serious threatened by the late ripening of the crops, the early decay of desert vegetation, and the unusually large outbreak of locusts. The destruction of large areas of wheat and barley is anticipated.

DRIED FRUIT REPORT.

Messrs. J. C. Houghton and Co., of Liverpool, report as follows under date July 3:—

Currants.—The slack state of affairs existing during May has not in any way been relieved during the period under review, and business continued on the smallest possible scale, and with nothing occurring to stimulate buyers to greater activity. In the early days of the month, with the sharp improvement in the exchange and a corresponding advance in price on the Greek market, it was hoped more interest would be shown here; but unfortunately no response was forthcoming, and we finish the month with a most disappointing trade passing. Holders realising the strength of the statistical position are displaying great firmness, being content to await the renewal of the demand long overdue. The arrivals have been:—S.s. Silja, with 500 tons; s.s. Cavallo, with 300 tons; s.s. Gulf of Suez, with 120 tons; but only a small proportion was available for market purposes. Transactions were:—Pyrgos, 55s. 6d. to 56s.; cleaned, 58s. to 62s. (in request); Zante, bags, 57s. to 59s.; Gulf and Panariti, 59s. to 63s.; Vostizza, 63s. to 73s.; Smalls, 68s. to 72s. Quotations:—Pyrgos, 56s.; Amalias and Patras, 57s. to 60s.; Zante, 57s. to 61s.; Gulf and Panariti, 58s. to 63s.; Vostizza, 63s. to 73s. Further arrivals of Australian 2 and 3 Crowns, per s.s. Anchises, sold at 69s. to 71s. respectively.

Raisins.—Cape selling freely at 38s. to 40s. f.a.q. and 45s. g.a.q. A few Australian Lexias realised 45s.

Sultanas.—We are unable to report an improvement in the state of our market, which remains dull, business being of quite insignificant dimensions. Some forced quay sales of the last arrivals per Egyptian from Smyrna caused a drop in prices, and some excellent parcels changed hands at 70s. to 72s. 6d. In the fine grades some sales at 80s. to 85s. are reported. Greeks, slow of sale at 70s. to 78s. Australians, difficult to move at 90s. 2 Crowns and 95s. 3 Crowns, the turnover being most disappointing. South Africans, Sundried selling 65s. to 70s. Afghans, with the exception of yellow at 60s. to 65s., are neglected.

THE CONSTANTINOPLE MARKET.

The following extracts are taken from a report received by the Imperial Ottoman Bank from Constantinople for the month of June :—

There is no appreciable change to note since last month regarding our market. As it was easy to predict, trade could not improve whilst the political situation remains unchanged.

There has been some activity in manufactured goods owing to orders from Persia and to the small but regular shipments made for Anatolia. Stocks, which are almost exhausted, are being continually renewed, but importers dare not place more than small orders.

Cabots.—Owing to orders from Persia and to a lesser extent from Anatolia, there is a certain movement in cabots. The cabot, which used to take first place amongst manufactured articles, has fallen back enormously since Roumanian buyers have made a habit of passing their orders direct to the countries of origin. The present stock of cabots here amounts to 150-200 bales, and the prices have not varied.

Empty Sacks from Calcutta.—For the same reason as in the case of cabots, transactions in empty sacks have lost their former importance.

Sugar.—In the countries producing sugar the fall in price which has been ruling for some time still continues. This is the more marked owing to the news that the next harvest will be abundant. The steps taken by holders of American sugar, with a view to keeping up prices, have not met with success so far. Prices at present ruling for sugar are as follows, per ton and in transit :—American, £35 10s. to £34 ; Dutch, £33 10s. to £34 ; Java, £33 to £34. Sugar in bond now costs : Crystallised, £T44 to £T45 per 100 kilos ; cube, £T47 to £T48 per 100 kilos.

Coffee.—After some unimportant fluctuations in price, coffee remained firm for some time. Nevertheless there has been a tendency to fall of late. This is due to the abundance of the new crop and to the haste with which holders are liquidating their stocks. This market has, in spite of the present general state of things, proceeded to purchase some lots, to be delivered next month. However, news concerning this article from abroad not being very reassuring, has rendered business uncertain. The present stock amounts to 2,500 sacks of coffee, prices for which are :—Ps. 57 to 62 per oke for goods in transit ; Ps. 91 to 96 per oke for goods in bond, according to qualities.

Rice.—Owing to lack of orders from the countries which usually apply to us for supplies, business in this commodity is insignificant. Local consumption, especially at this time of the year, is very restricted. Prices in transit :—Rangoon, £14 to £14 10s. per ton ; Siam, £15 per ton.

Wheat and Flour.—Dealers in flour have been able to use up their stocks during the month under review, and thus proceed to place new orders in America, but almost exclusively in wheat, the new customs laws rendering the importation of flour almost impossible. The present stock is about 60,000 sacks of flour of different qualities.

Anglo-Egyptian Oil Output :—Week ended July 6 : Gemsah production, 12 tons (previous week, 2 tons) ; Hurghada, 3,096 tons (against 2,846 tons).

The Levant Company announces that the scheme for the writing down of the capital and the reorganisation of the company has been confirmed by the Court, and that an issue of 200,000 Ordinary shares of £1 each is being offered to the old shareholders, of which the greater part has already been assured.

SHIPPING OF CONSTANTZA IN 1922

Constantza serves chiefly as a transit port for the rest of Roumania, importing for the other parts of the country, and exporting principally petroleum products and grain, for the loading of which alone can facilities be said to exist (says the British Vice-Consul at Constantza, Mr. R. H. Tottenham Smith, in his report for 1922). Much of the trade of the port was lost to Galatz and Braila after the war owing to the destruction of the railway bridge over the Danube. The reconstruction of this was completed early in the year, and the position in respect of communications thereby improved. The trade of the port is still, however, behind that of the last normal pre-war year, 1913.

The exports through Constantza during the year amounted to some 485,560 tons, and the imports to 218,692 tons. The principal countries to which goods have been shipped are Italy, Turkey, Egypt, Belgium, France and England. Petroleum products have gone to Egypt, Turkey, England, Italy, France and Greece, and agricultural products to Italy, Belgium, France, Greece and Turkey. In the month of May, 1922, it was calculated that of the total exports of Roumania, 8 per cent. of the cereals, 37 per cent. of the petrol products, 0.35 per cent. of the timber, and 2 per cent. of the live stock were exported through Constantza.

Very few fresh works have been undertaken or completed. A small quay in the inner harbour for motor boats and small craft is being constructed, and one additional warehouse has been completed. Warehousing space, on the whole, is inadequate, and the port is very liable to congestion in winter on this account. The conditions generally, however, are improving slowly, and an additional tax is being levied on shipping to provide funds for improving the port works. A disinfecting station for immigrants is nearing completion.

NEW STRICK LINE STEAMER.

The finely modelled steamer Kohistan, built by Messrs. William Gray and Co., Ltd., West Hartlepool, for Messrs. Frank C. Strick and Co. (1923), Ltd., London, undertook a successful trial trip on June 28. The main dimensions of this vessel are:—Length, overall, 362 ft. 9 in.; breadth, extreme, 52 ft. 6 in.; depth, moulded, 29 ft. 4½ in.; and deadweight about 6,700 tons.

The propelling machinery, supplied by the Central Marine Engine Works of the builders, consists of triple-expansion engines, with cylinders 26 in., 42 in., and 70 in. diameter by 48 in. stroke, and three boilers, 15 ft. diameter by 12 ft. 2 in. long, adapted for a working pressure of 200 lb. per square inch. An oil fuel burning installation is fitted, working in conjunction with Howden's system of forced draught.

A large number of "C.M.E.W." steamship auxiliaries are fitted, including auxiliary condenser, direct contact feed heater, feed water purifying tank, a pair of independent boiler feed pumps, centrifugal pump, combined air and circulating pumps, general service pump, auxiliary harbour feed pump, fuel oil transfer pump, evaporator, and a "C.M.E.W." thermo. couple installation.

The owners were represented by Mr. Black, also Mr. Archibald Walker, under whose superintendence the vessel has been completed.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES.

July 10.

The exchanges have been very unsettled during the past week, owing to the uncertainty with regard to the Reparations question. German marks reached the new low level of 1,275,000. French francs have weakened to 78.50, while Belgian francs and Italian lire are both lower at 95.45 and 108 respectively. Sterling exchange on New York is slightly lower at 4.56 5/16. In Near Eastern exchanges, Turkish piastres are unchanged at 710, Greek drachmae are slightly harder at 145, Roumanian lei are 910 as against 895, while Bulgarian leva have risen to 450.

Company Meeting.

ORIENTAL TELEPHONE AND ELECTRIC.

Increase of Capital Approved.

The twenty-ninth ordinary general meeting of the Oriental Telephone and Electric Company, Ltd., was held on July 3 at the Abercorn Rooms, Great Eastern Hotel, Bishopsgate, E.C.

Sir Henry Babington Smith, G.B.E., C.H., K.C.B., C.S.I., chairman of the company, presided.

The Secretary (Mr. J. Macleod) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman, in the course of his speech in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that the net result of the year's operations was that the balance of revenue carried to the balance-sheet was £49,010, as against £49,227 last year. The board recommended the payment of a final dividend on the ordinary shares at 6 per cent., free of income-tax, making 10 per cent., free of income-tax, for the year, and also a bonus of 2 per cent., free of income-tax, on the ordinary shares. That was the same rate as last year. They also recommended the transfer of £10,000 to the depreciation and general reserve account, and of £2,000 to the staff pension fund, these amounts being the same as last year. If they approved these recommendations they would be left with £9,274 to carry forward to next year. He mentioned last year that the number of exchange lines in the systems worked by the Oriental Telephone and Electric Company, Ltd., and the associated companies, was in December, 1921, 35,000. It was on December 31, 1922, 37,513, an increase of 2,513, being at the rate of 7 per cent. for the year.

This rate of progress was not so rapid as that which had been realised in recent years, but it had to be remembered that there were several causes to account for this result. Business conditions had been unfavourable, and it would be readily understood that the rate of entension of the telephone service was not a bad index of the prevailing business prosperity or the reverse.

He dealt at some length at their meeting last year with the question of the Indian licences and also with the negotiations regarding their licences at Hong Kong and Singapore. In India, the new agreements between the Bombay and Bengal companies and the Indian Government had already been signed. Since then the agreements relating to Madras and Rangoon had also been signed. A new local company had been formed at Madras and had taken over the undertaking, the transfer price of £110,000 being satisfied by fully-paid shares in the new company. In Rangoon a similar course was being pursued, the transfer consideration in this case being £145,000, also payable in fully-paid shares of the new company. They had now obtained, under the terms of the new agreement, an undisturbed tenure for twenty years from 1923, and had undertaken certain obligations as to provision of thoroughly efficient and modern plant. The provisions as to rates sanctioned an increased maximum, and also provided for periodical revision on the basis of a standard dividend of 12½ per cent. on the paid-up capital—of which 8 per cent. was cumulative—after due allowance, not exceeding 8 per cent. per annum, for depreciation and reserve.

The Bombay and Bengal companies had been reorganised, and steps had been taken for raising the additional capital required for the modernisation and extension of the systems.

Although demands for capital would be to some extent met by local capital, where local companies had been formed, it would still be necessary for the Oriental Company to bear a large part of the burden, and they found it necessary for that purpose to ask them to sanction an increase in the capital of the company in both preference and ordinary shares. They proposed to increase the authorised ordinary share capital from 300,000 to 600,000 shares of £1 each, and the authorised preference share capital from 100,000 to 300,000 shares of £1 each. As the preference shareholders were asked to assent to that substantial increase in the preference issue, they thought it right that they should have some increase in the rate of interest in the preference shares, and they proposed that the rate should be raised from 6 per cent. to 7 per cent.

It was not the board's intention to issue at once the whole of the additional capital when it was created. The sum of about £300,000 would suffice for present needs, and they proposed to offer to the ordinary shareholders on the register on July 1, 1923, one new ordinary share at par and one new preference share at par for every two shares held. The ordinary and preference shares thus offered would not be separable.

Mr. G. Parker Ness seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

At the extraordinary general meeting which followed resolutions increasing the rate of interest on the existing preference shares to 7 per cent., and modifying the articles of association, as proposed by the notice, were carried.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Lausanne: The Last Phase.

Angora's capacity for keeping out of touch with realities is unlimited. A week ago agreement was reached at Lausanne on the three questions that were delaying the signature of peace. The news, as soon as it reached Angora, was received with evident public satisfaction; in Turkish circles in Constantinople it evoked genuine expressions of relief and delight. Within twenty-four hours, however, reaction set in at Angora; Constantinople was warned not to believe any reports except those from the Anatolian capital, and the Turkish delegation at Lausanne was instructed to reopen the questions on which Ismet Pasha had formally signified his agreement. With no other country could such an eleventh-hour development have been possible. The head of the delegation instructed to go back upon his pledges would have resigned his post, and there must have been, at least, sufficient stir in the country itself to have cleared up the incongruity of the proceedings. In the case of the Allies' dealings with Turkey nothing of the sort happens. The Lausanne Conference continues, Ismet Pasha prepares to make fresh agreements, which may in turn be repudiated, and the Angora Government is convinced more than ever that it is the salt of the earth and in a position to dictate to the world. Now, as these lines go to press, comes the report that agreement has once more been reached at Lausanne. This time it seems probable that Angora will confirm the statement, and, accordingly, five years after the Armistice, and towards the one hundred and seventieth session of the Lausanne Conference, an end will have been placed to the state of war nominally existing between Turkey and the Allies.

The Taming of Turkey.

In spite of all this, however, it must be clear to every thinking person that in all the circumstances the Allies' patient tolerance has been the wisest policy to adopt. Turkey would have every reason to be grateful if a swift and severe lesson could be read to the backwoodsmen of Anatolia, who are making their country an object of the civilised world's contempt and disgust; but in this matter the Turks are destined to work out their own salvation. The folly of Angora stops short of the stage at which war would be inevitable, and for the Allies there is no other language that those who now wield power in Turkey understand. There can be no doubt, however, that the population of Turkey contains an element which resents the disservice which is being done to the Turks as a whole. Provided, therefore, that the Allies can maintain their present policy indefinitely, it may not be a bad thing for the Angora régime to pile on the agony. To a certain point the spectacle of their country holding its own against the nations of the world is one that must appeal to all Turks; it is only when physical resistance has ceased to play its part and gives place to obstinacy born of ignorance or lack of intellect that the nation's reputation becomes involved. Each day that passes now sees the number of Turks dissatisfied with the Angora régime increasing. Consequently, the more foolish and the more exasperating the conduct of the Turkish Government, the shorter the interval to the time when Allied interests in Turkey may hope to receive reasonable treatment.

The Failure of Angora.

The contradictory reports received from Angora point to a sharp line of cleavage even in the ranks of the Turkish authorities in the capital. Of Mustapha Kemal Pasha, Mr. Alwyn Parker, who signed the agreement for the settlement of the Smyrna-Aidin Railway's claims, writes that he "is a man of remarkable integrity and piercing insight, and all his weight is thrown on to the side of moderation." Yet another representative of British interests finds himself confronted with an attempt at undisguised robbery on the part of the spokesman of the Angora Government. In Constantinople the Galata Bridge toll-money is forcibly appropriated by someone in authority, while the Governor of the city unofficially denounces the act. Mustapha Kemal Pasha will not be the first man who, in coming to the rescue of his country, has aroused forces that he has subsequently been unable to control. Unfortunately, he does not appear to have been able to dissociate himself sufficiently from his extremist section to satisfy the Turkish moderates that the country can be won to a saner policy with his help. The part that he played in the elections may have gained for him a great personal success; but it is difficult for the onlooker to see in it either piercing insight or common-sense. Every allowance can be made for men who have experienced the hardships associated with the Kemalist movement, among which has to be reckoned for many the deportation at the hands of the British Government to Malta; but Angora has failed in not being able to realise where the boundary line between the penalisation of foreign interests and the promotion of Turkish interests is situated. It will come to grief ultimately for its failure in regard to the latter, which will one day loom larger in Turkish eyes, than its success in regard to the former.

Yugoslavia.

In spite of the precarious position that his Government holds in Yugoslavia as a result of its numerical weakness in the Skupshtina, M. Pashitch is making the most of the opportunity afforded him by the mistaken tactics of the Croatian leader, M. Raditch. He has not hesitated to carry war into the Croatian camp, and M. Raditch is now calling upon the Croats to carry out a boycott of everything Serbian. More important than this quarrel, in which the federal-centralist issue is for the time being lost sight of in the personal clash, is the step taken by the Cabinet in passing through the Skupshtina a measure for the fivefold increase of the land tax. Hitherto all Yugoslav Governments have preferred to face any deficit rather than impose upon the peasants, who form 80 per cent. of the electorate, a just share of taxation. The greatest sufferers are the officials of the new kingdom, who are grossly underpaid, to the prejudice of the State service and of Yugoslavia's reputation. With more revenue in the Exchequer it is to be hoped that it will be found possible to increase official salaries, even if it be necessary to curtail the military vote in order to do so. The Yugoslav Government has followed its Roumanian neighbour in recognising the necessity for financial equilibrium. Perhaps, after the conference shortly to be held at Sinaia it will realise the possibility of further reductions in the army, with a view to increasing the efficiency of the civil service.

Palestine's Troubles.

A further outrage by brigands in Palestine, this time on the railway in the northern sector, following hard upon the murder of Captain Swann, near Ramleh, and the report of an engagement between a detachment of British gendarmerie and a band in the south suggest that for the moment the security of the country is far more important than its constitution. Palestine, unfortunately, lends itself to the activities of bandits, but it is an axiom in all countries that these gentry can flourish only with the connivance in the long run of the villagers in the neighbourhood where they operate. The authorities, therefore, have done well to take prompt police measures against the villagers. All Mukhtars of neighbouring and suspected villages have been arrested, and stocks of cattle have been impounded as guarantees that the villagers will assist in the pursuit of the men responsible for the shooting of railway officials on a motor rail-trolley between Tel Keram and Kilkilieh. Sooner or later the villagers themselves are the victims of the brigands, unless they purchase exemption, and it is to their interests, therefore, to support measures for the suppression of the bands. The Palestine Government, we trust, will regard the brigandage question very seriously, and will take steps to ensure that within three months the country will be cleared of all brigands at present on the active list so effectively that others will not feel inclined to take up the profession.

Self-Help in the Hejaz.

The microbe of independence, which caused Naaman to rank the rivers Abana and Pharpar as high as the Jordan, has never been exorcised from the descendants of Shem, and to-day the Egyptians, having successfully demonstrated the equality of nations in their own case, are called upon to consider the doctrine from a different angle. The King of the Hejaz has raised objections to the entry of an Egyptian medical mission, which in the past has accompanied the pilgrimage to Mecca. It has to be inferred that the feelings of the Hejazis are as outraged at the attendance in their midst of Egyptian doctors as the Egyptians themselves at the presence in Egypt of a British financial adviser or irrigation expert. There can, of course, be no comparison between the unqualified practitioner who controls quarantine measures at Jeddah and the skilled medical officers whom Egypt can lend to the Hejaz, and it will, no doubt, cause the gravest misgivings to the pilgrims to be deprived of the first-rate medical attention available for them in the past. They may, perhaps, feel tempted to sympathise for the first time with the British in Egypt, who have been accustomed to place British knowledge and administrative experience as high above Egyptian attainments as the Egyptians rightly place their own capacity above that of the Hejazis. The British, however, have reconciled themselves to the cult of the second-best in Egypt, and the interests of peace and the pilgrimage would seem to suggest that the Egyptians should adopt a similar attitude towards the Hejazis in their efforts to stand on their dignity. In the meantime the Holy Carpet returns to Cairo from an abortive journey, and the Hejaz sacrifices a grant of £8,000 in the noble cause of independence.

Persia and Irak.

Until conditions in Persia are sufficiently stabilised to make correct relations with its neighbours one of the cardinal points of the Persian Government's policy, the Irak Government is likely to have a certain amount of trouble with ecclesiastical fanatics in its midst. As far as the principal Holy Cities—Kerbela and Nejef—are concerned, it should not be difficult to devise a modus vivendi that will satisfy the priestly authorities that they have nothing much to fear in regard to their special privileges, provided that they do not set themselves up in active opposition to the State. To have these two towns more or less in political watertight compartments for a period will not be a very serious embarrassment to the country, and it may strengthen the hands of the Government to show this amount of deference to the Shiah hierarchy until public opinion has had time to compare the respective merits of civil and priestly rule. So long, however, as Shiah priests are led to suppose that they can count on some measure of Persian support for intrigue against the Irak Government, so long will it be necessary for the latter to deal firmly with agitation such as that which has led to the deportation of the Sheikh Mahdi al Khalisi and his two sons who tried to stir up trouble in Khazimain. It would be a friendly act on the part of the Persian Government to discourage all attempts to agitate on Persian soil against Irak or Great Britain.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

The Heat Wave.

Every generation, one supposes, thinks it has a monopoly of the unreliability of the English climate, which must always have been the most perfectly wanton thing ever created; but even by the old people, who remember snow at Christmas and sunshine in June, and all the other proprieties, it is admitted that we are experiencing entirely new joys and sorrows. This last week it has been too wearisome even to fret under the heat; one's main thoughts have been, for the male, what to drink, and for the female, wherewithal she shall be clothed. The colossal storm which early last week smote us with such force as to be one of the heaviest on record, is now ancient and tiresome history; its only interest lies in the fact deduced from it, that, whereas we used to look upon a storm as the breaker-up of a heat-wave, now we cannot reckon even upon that. In fact, the weather in these 'twenties has become quite unreckonable, inexplicable, and incorrigible. But, of course, we all take it as it comes. The more sensible of us have already fled to the seaside: for those who are left to work, London seems like a brazen prison, with the railway carriages in which one has to travel giving off heat like furnaces. In all good smoking compartments men throw off their coats and stew in their shirts; the women, of course, have already "said when" in regard to their attire.

Reparations and Other Things.

Compared with the weather, nothing that has recently happened has been of any account. The news that peace was to be signed at Lausanne caused not a single extra drop of perspiration; and we did not mop our brows when we learned that it was not to be signed so soon, after all. The papers made a brave effort to get us interested in Mr. Baldwin's speech on reparations, and, indeed, we all did our duty towards his sensible utterance; but, on hearing that France would definitely have none of it until passive resistance in the Ruhr ceased, we at once, and without a sigh, got back to our flannels and dreams of coolth and ease. One suspects that the world will have to wait for the weather before strong action comes from Britain; if we can do nothing but drink in the day and anything but sleep at night, what can you expect? Still, in spite of all that the Meteorological Office may say, a change may come any day; and it is obvious that Mr. Baldwin is determined soon to solve the Reparations problem. His attitude is extremely popular in the country.

European Peace.

Although it was expected, it was nevertheless extremely comforting to find in the Premier's speech none of the sloppy talk that issues from the feeble-minded about forgiveness of Germany. He spoke well on the evil that the occupation of the Ruhr is doing to the economic life of Europe, and particularly to our own economic future—that was well within his province, and indeed was his duty; but he spoke equally well on sympathy with France and on Britain's determination to extract Reparations. Yet to some extent this straight, plain speech has been misunderstood, and we have had floods of the terrible wearying nonsense about breaking with France and taking Germany by the hand to lead her to the blessed ways of reconstruction. Once more, and still more nauseatingly, we have been told that a nation like Germany cannot be destroyed (though these very same people persist in saying that such destruction is the inevitable consequence of a prolonged occupation of the Ruhr); but they are seen for the pacifists they are, and cut no more ice than they deserve. We may take it now that the French and British Governments are at one in their estimate of Germany's mental attitude; and the difference which separates them upon the best means of getting reparations will certainly not cause a definite break-up of the Entente. If I were a Frenchman I should certainly back M. Poincaré, because, not being one, I still find it the most sensible thing to do.

Lord's Week.

Lord's Week—in other words, Cambridge—suffered badly from the weather. One cannot begrudge the fact that Oxford, who won so overwhelmingly by an innings and over two hundred runs, were probably the better side; but the storm on Monday night took all the fight out of the match. To those who sleeplessly cursed the luck of the Light Blues, the result was a foregone conclusion; but it was hopelessly confirmed by a look at the poisonous wicket with the sun shining on it. The second day was a melancholy affair, with little enthusiasm.

Things were better ordered for the Eton and Harrow match, which ended in a draw, much in Eton's favour. The pitch was too replete with runs—there were two centuries for Eton and one for Harrow—for the probability of any result; but the game was interesting, apart from some excellent batting and fielding, as showing how bad schoolboy bowling can be. Such indulgence in "polyhoppers" should really not be tolerated.

The Gentlemen versus Players game should be a fine match. The Players team is a good and dependable one; the Gentlemen will do either gloriously or ingloriously—there is nothing mediocre or certain about them. If the heat decreases a little, it will be the game of the season.

Albert Chevalier.

There were few people in this country who did not notice the death of Albert Chevalier, a loved and very lovable stage artist. Chevalier was a very fine, because very typical, English artist; he spurned all "method" and appealed straight to the heart. The highbrow who was oppressed by his sentimentality would speak admiringly of his "technique"; but, in fact, it was to the core of the matter that Chevalier travelled; his technical facilities were natural and unconscious. It is possible that no coster ever existed such as his coster impersonation was, but the English public adores exaggeration, especially if it is lovingly done, and everything Chevalier did was done with loving purpose. Sentimentality on the stage, particularly on the music hall stage, is probably the most nauseating feature of to-day; but Chevalier's sentimentality was always of a different genre from that of others; it never existed for its own sake, and was, therefore, at worst tolerable, and at best an inseparable part of a much higher thing. To say that he commanded both tears and laughter is a commonplace; but to say that he employed this combined command uniquely is the bare truth. Although he was typical, he was never a type; and it may be long before the stage finds so refreshing and rare a spirit as his.

Lady Astor's Bill.

By a majority of 257 votes to 10 Lady Astor contrived to get passed by the House of Commons her notorious Bill, which raises to eighteen the age at which intoxicants may be bought in public-houses. It says much for the sentiment of the members who voted for it, but very little for their sense, for in truth the Bill is the worst kind of Puritanical legislation. Lady Astor's mind derives from the seventeenth century, which, when it saw that excessive indulgence in harmless pleasures produced danger to the State, vented its condemnation on the pleasure itself, and sought to bind the offender hand and foot. The 257 members who voted for this Bill do not see that in drinking itself is no harm, but that it is the system under which drinking in this country is permitted that is wrong. Compare our public-houses with, say, the cafés of France, in which whole families happily congregate, and then declare whether it is drink itself or the law governing potation that is wrong.

THE LEBANON HOSPITAL FOR MENTAL DISEASES.

The annual general meeting of the Lebanon Hospital for Mental Diseases, Asfuriyeh, Beyrout, was held at the rooms of the Medical Society of London, 11, Chandos Street, Cavendish Square, on June 19, the chair being taken first by Dr. R. Percy Smith and later by Dr. Masterman.

The committee's report for the past year, March, 1922-23, was read by the general secretary, Miss A. M. Gooch, and its adoption was moved by Bishop Bury (Bishop of Northern and Central Europe) and seconded by Mr. Martindale.

Dr. Watson Smith, the director, said that when he came home four years ago he had nothing to report upon, except the dilapidated condition there. They were needing bread, so that there was no money to spend on buildings and repairs, but now they had a quite different story to tell. He always thought that if anything like a responsible Government were to exercise its influence in Syria things would improve, for Syria had been ruined in the past from every point of view. Since the French came into Beyrout the public health authorities had taken up the question of dealing with the insane, and now contributed a certain amount towards the maintenance of the patients, thus liberating a certain amount of money which had been used in improving the hospital. The first matter which demanded attention was the water supply. They used to have one spring, which supplied the hospital imperfectly. The rains fell only in winter months, and as during the six summer months absolutely no rain came, the springs failed by November. The Executive Committee dealt promptly with the matter. They followed up some old springs, which greatly added to the water supply, so that they were now somewhat better able to meet immediate hospital requirements, but he could not say that this was at all adequate. They had not a drop of water for cultivation. By the end of July everything was burnt up by the sun. It would materially help in the treatment of the patients if they had plentiful water for baths. They could also add considerably to the economic management of the hospital by cultivating vegetables and food for animals, and thus have their own dairy.

All the buildings were in a better condition than they had ever been before. The kitchen had been thoroughly repaired and means of procuring hot water supplied. The Strawbridge House given by American friends had been furnished and made ready for women patients. The old air gas light machines were sold, and the pharmacy taken to this spot in the centre of the buildings, which was decidedly more convenient than by the entrance as before. A clinical laboratory had also been added. The London Committee sent the money to instal the electric light, which was a great success, and was sufficiently large to meet the demands of an increase up to one-third beyond the present needs. In connection with the American University in Beyrout, they had started classes for the teaching of psychiatry, so the influence of the hospital was extended beyond its immediate sphere. Formerly these students had no training in mental diseases; they now came to Asfuriyeh and heard lectures on mental diseases; also they received clinical instruction. They still needed an electro-medical installation for the hospital in order to bring their means of treatment up to modern demands, and they were hoping that someone would kindly provide this very necessary addition as soon as possible.

A tablet is to be placed on No. 2, Carlton Gardens to commemorate the residence there of Lord Kitchener.

The number of Jewish immigrants who entered Palestine during the five months ended May was 4,080—1,647 men, 1,345 women, and 1,088 children.

Ratifications of the Roumano-Polish Sanitary Convention concluded in Warsaw on December 20, 1922, were exchanged on July 12 in Bucharest.

An appeal has been lodged against the conviction of the thirteen persons accused of conspiracy and of murdering British officials in Egypt.

A Reuter message from Teheran states that the deportation from Iraq of the Shiah Mujtahid Sheikh Mahdi el Khalisi has caused excitement in Persia, and that the town guard had to disperse a crowd of demonstrators in front of the British Legation.

Mgr. Meletios, the Œcumenical Patriarch, reached Mitylene on July 11, and was warmly greeted by the inhabitants of the island. He then transferred to a Greek cruiser, in which he continued his voyage to the Mylopotamos Monastery on Mount Athos. It is announced that it is his intention to pass there the remainder of his life.

YUGOSLAVIA.

Liubliana, July 5.

The Increase in Taxation.

The Government of M. Pashitch has won a bold and signal victory. The Dvanajstine, as the three-months' budget is called (from dvanaestina = one-twelfth, i.e., one month), has been passed by the Skupshtina, and with it the new taxes. Land tax is being increased by 500 per cent., and income-tax by 30 per cent., which means an annual increase of half-a-million dinars in the revenue.

This increase in taxation, especially in the land tax, was a necessity of State, which not even the extreme Opposition sought to deny. All the same, it seemed almost impossible that it would obtain the necessary majority in Parliament. It must not be forgotten that the standard by which legislation, and more especially new and unpopular taxation, is judged in Yugoslavia, is not expediency, but the temper of the electorate. Now more than 80 per cent. of the electors are peasants, traditionally pampered by all the parties and habitually told that the peasant is the true prop of the State. This is correct enough in many ways, but quite untrue as regards taxation. Before the War the peasant had to sell at least a calf in order to pay his taxes; now he can raise the necessary sum by selling a dozen or so of eggs. The explanation of this anomaly is that the taxes have nominally remained the same, whereas the price of provisions has gone up far beyond 100 per cent. The natural consequence of this in the early days after the Liberation was recourse to the issue of paper currency which, in its turn, led inevitably to a fall in the rate of exchange, and automatically entailed a growing deficit in the State budget. Certainly the former Coalition Government made an effort to get the budget to balance. New taxes were introduced (as, e.g., the 1 per cent. tax on business turnover), but the Government lacked the courage to raise the land tax. As a makeshift it increased the various dues—which could be done without special legislation—and so incidentally deflected the wrath of the electorate solely upon the Minister of Finance. But these were mere half-measures; because it is obvious that in order to be sound, a State's finances must rest above all on ordinary, and not upon extraordinary, expenditure; and dues are extraordinary expenditure. The most important of the ordinary taxes is unquestionably the land tax, and the following may serve to illustrate how entirely justifiable, nay, desirable, was an increase in this direction. Of all parts of the State, Slovenia contributes most conscientiously to the land tax, owing to a faultlessly drawn-up land register. Yet the total revenue from land tax in Slovenia does not amount to as much as the upkeep of the stud in Liubliana!

The Land Tax.

Yet there was a fierce fight over the passing of the new land tax, and the Opposition parties lost no opportunity of playing for popularity by "making a stand" against the new taxation. Under the influence of this agitation sharp hostility to the measure broke out even within the ranks of the Radical Club. Led by Deputy Rankovitch, Vice-President of the Skupshtina, the Agrarian deputies demanded that the proposed increase in the land tax should be dropped altogether. But the Minister of Finance was not to be moved. Then the Agrarian deputies demanded that the land tax might be paid in State Bonds and War Indemnity Securities. But the State wants money, and not its own credit, and again the Minister of Finance refused to give way. The struggle became acute, and it almost seemed as though the Minister of Finance would be compelled to resign. Then M. Pashitch threw the whole weight of his influence into the balance. The situation was saved, and the Radical Club voted solidly for the new taxes.

Two symptoms show the severity of the struggle. The German deputies, who had so far loyally supported the Radicals in all other questions, left them in the lurch over the land tax, party interests proving stronger than economic interests. And the Slovene Koroshets Party threatened to leave the Skupshtina in a body if the new taxes were passed. Even this threat did not shake the Minister of Finance in his purpose; and probably even Dr. Koroshets realised in the end that it would scarcely look well if a highly necessary increase in taxation were the reason for his boycotting the Skupshtina.

Compulsory Labour Service.

Together with the new taxes, Universal Labour Conscription for the repair of roads and highways has been brought in. Every male citizen is bound for one fortnight in the year to work without pay at the improvement of the public roads. Owners of horses and vehicles have to give the use of their animals and conveyances free of charge for the same period. Whoever desires exemption from this obligation has to pay a fairly large sum. As all the public roads were extensively used during the War and practically no repairing was done, the roads in Yugoslavia are now in a truly disgraceful state. On the other hand, the cost of labour is at present so high that the State cannot afford out of its pocket to have them repaired within a short space of time. For these reasons Universal Conscription of Labour is certainly justified. But whether the Yugoslav Administration is capable of carrying through this conscription justly and usefully is another question. Certainly the engineers will have a big say in the matter. All the same, we feel rather pessimistic about it.

But the taxes just approved are by no means the last of the new burdens—rather the prelude to fresh taxation.

State Officials.

The Skupshtina has been prorogued for nine days to enable the deputies to pacify their rebellious constituencies. But on July 9 it will reassemble to discuss the important Army Law and to solve the State officials and employees' question. The Army Law will in all probability have a smooth passage, and be accepted without special difficulties, to judge by the discussion in committee. But there will be a stiff fight over the officials question, although in committee all parties were unanimous for a favourable solution of the problem. The Radical Government will not content itself with academic assurances, and demands that a balance should be established between the rise in the officials' salaries and the taxes needful for that purpose. Nor is this all. The Minister of Finance also demands a "cut" in the number of officials as the only way of determining what funds he will have at his disposal for raising the salaries of those that are left. Hence the Government will place the Opposition before a very awkward alternative—either to vote for the taxes and prove that the party was in earnest about improving the lot of the officials, or to vote against them and so against the measure designed to help the officials as well. This may break the hostility of the Opposition parties towards the new taxes required for the settlement of this question of officials' salaries; but not the opposition of the Agrarian Deputies in the Radical Club, who will wish to get a bit of their own back as a set-off against their discomfiture over the Land Tax.

Pashitch and Raditch.

All the same, we may assume that M. Pashitch's Government will again prove victorious, and that on account of M. Raditch's attitude. M. Raditch's speeches make a big impression upon the Croatian peasant, but a far bigger one upon his Serbian confrère. And the more energetically M. Pashitch fulminates against M. Raditch, the more closely do the Serbs rally round him, regardless of party allegiance. This was made amply clear on the occasion of the recent attempt upon the Prime Minister's life, when even Sarajevo—the Croat and Moslem City—demonstrated for M. Pashitch. And so the Prime Minister's authority will surely preserve unity in the Radical Club over this question also and make the new taxes possible.

The Chances of M. Raditch.

The rapprochement between the Radicals and M. Raditch has come to an end. The Government forbade M. Raditch's mass meeting in Zagreb; whereupon M. Raditch declared ruthless war upon the Government, but apparently without the courage to prosecute it to its logical conclusion. He proposes somehow to vanquish the Belgrade Government by some nebulous effect of perfect passive resistance. His watchword to the peasants is—not to undertake anything active against the Government, but to obey every order of the authorities; to suffer even the confiscation of the Republican colours, since no flag is worth a drop of blood. But if an opponent of M. Raditch's party comes into the village, then none shall give him food or house-room.

How this line of action—or inaction—is to overthrow the Government is one of M. Raditch's mysteries. But he has other grounds for hope—above all, those forthcoming elections at which he will surely obtain over one hundred Deputies. Nothing is impossible in this world, more especially in Yugoslavia, and so we will admit the chance that M. Raditch's plan might succeed. Yet it is doubtful whether he would, even with the greatest good luck, obtain a clear majority in the Skupshtina. He will still be compelled to do what he now declines to do—namely, to come to an agreement with the ruling Serbian party, and as a preliminary condition to jettison his "humanitarian pacifist peasant republic," and put in an appearance in the Belgrade Skupshtina as a fellow Deputy.

But can M. Raditch afford to do this after his oratorical flights to the clouds? Has he the necessary courage? We for our part believe an emphatic "No" to be the correct answer to both questions. Because M. Raditch has two things to fear. Were he to agitate in Belgrade as he does in Zagreb, his life would be in danger from the Serbs. And if he is conciliatory, his Croats in Zagreb might resent it with equal severity. It is a case of Scylla and Charybdis.

So M. Raditch's passive resistance policy is not likely to succeed, and this is beginning to be realised even in Croatia. It is reported from Zagreb that the Croatian intellectuals, who were almost wholly attached to M. Raditch, are gradually being split up in two camps. One group is for an active policy, the other still follows M. Raditch blindly. In Bosnia the opponents to the passive resistance policy are decidedly on the increase, which is fatal to M. Raditch's election calculations.

The Position of Yugoslavia.

Yugoslavia's internal situation is improving, and the passing of fresh taxation is the best proof of it. There is less childlike hope for help from heaven, and more self-help. And that makes for consolidation.

This is beginning to tell in the external situation also. The coup d'état in Bulgaria, which might so easily have been a menace to peace, has passed off without ill consequences. Relations with Albania, which used to be so strained, have become truly friendly, and Albania's entry into the Little Entente is becoming more and more probable. Even with Italy, this country's relations are becoming more correct, and that in spite of the still open question of Fiume and frequent annoyance on account of Italy's petty persecution of her Yugoslav subjects.

Only with Hungary the strained footing remains unchanged. Dreams of past glories of the Crown of St. Stephen refuse to die out in Hungary. Yet this is the only obstacle to good neighbourly relations between Yugoslavia and the Magyars. It is not for us to judge who is to blame for the constant friction between the two; but one or two things may be pointed out. Was it wise of Budapest to rejoice so openly over the downfall of M. Stambolisky's Serbophil Government? Is it wise that official Hungary should give no ear to the voice of the Deputy Szakacs, who, in the Hungarian Parliament, advocated an agreement with the Little Entente? And that at a moment when Hungary urgently stands in need of an international loan, which can scarcely be realised without the goodwill of the Little Entente.

Unfortunately, Hungary still refuses to face facts, and there lies the whole root of the trouble. Who profits by it? Let Budapest give answer.

GREECE.

Athens, June 27.

General Pangalos.

The sudden dismissal of the Commander-in-Chief of the Greek Army, General Pangalos, of his Chief of Staff, and of two of the ablest corps commanders caused considerable surprise to everybody here. Even General Pangalos's enemies—and he has many—admit that it is mainly through his efforts and his iron will that the Hellenic Army regained its discipline and its old fighting spirit, thus providing M. Venizelos with that excellent trump card which the ex-Premier played so adroitly in Lausanne.

The Greek public are still in the dark concerning the true reasons of the ex-Commander-in-Chief's dismissal, as the newspapers, acting on strict orders of the Censor, merely published a few lines to the effect that General Pangalos (who a few days previously had a slight attack of dysentery) was granted two months' convalescent leave. The unsuspecting majority have no reason to doubt the accuracy of this information; there are others, however, who could tell an entirely different story concerning an intended coup d'état, the establishing of a dictatorship, and finally the creation of still another Republic in Europe. It is understood that one of the Powers is greatly annoyed with Colonel Plastiras, who, by his timely arrival in Salonika, succeeded in convincing General Pangalos that he was badly in need of a long rest. General Pierrakos Mavromihalis, hitherto Minister of War, has been appointed General Pangalos's successor, the former being temporarily replaced by the Prime Minister, Colonel Gonatas.

The Cost of Living.

Although the value of the drachma has improved by about 150 per cent., prices continue to be extremely high. Foreign imported commodities are, of course, considerably cheaper, but the prices of foodstuffs produced locally still remain at inaccessible heights. Cheese, for instance, great quantities of which are produced in this country, is sold at 35 drachmæ the oke, a price at which the best English or French cheese is now obtainable. Olive oil, butter, fruit, and vegetables are so expensive that many big firms are seriously thinking of importing them from Italy. Large quantities of potatoes are now regularly imported from Holland, and sold here at about 3.50 drs., instead of 8 drs. charged by local producers. And to think that only four years ago one could buy two okes of potatoes for 25 lepta! While doing all it can to reduce prices and suppress profiteering, the Government refrains from giving the good example. Quinine, for instance, which is a Government monopoly, is still sold at 6 drs. per tube of ten tablets, that being its price two months ago when the pound was quoted at 420 drs. The same applies to matches, 70 lepta being charged for a box not containing more than forty matches. Rents are even higher than before. For an unfurnished flat in one of the distant districts of Athens, and consisting of five small rooms, one is asked to pay at least 5,000 drs. (approx. £31) per month. The Athens correspondent who telegraphed to his paper in London that Greece was the most expensive country in Europe to-day, was certainly not very far from the truth.

Greek Prisoners in Turkey.

The International Commission appointed at the request of the Greek Government to inquire into and report on the condition of the Greek military prisoners who are still in the hands of the Turks has now completed its work and is about to submit its report. According to this, out of 2,000 Greek officers taken prisoners only 750 are to-day alive. With regard to the men, whereas according to the Turkish official communiqués more than 30,000 were taken prisoners (Greek official lists give their number as 54,000), only 14,000 are now alive. "The remainder," says the report, "were undoubtedly exterminated by the Turks." It is understood that the report, which consists of sixty typewritten pages, will be shortly printed in book form and circulated in France, Great Britain, and America.

Miscellaneous News.

The adjudication for the construction of important works at the port of Piræus, which was to have taken place a fortnight ago, has been postponed, as only one competitor representing a group of British and Greek firms presented himself. It is now announced that the adjudication will pro-

The Greek s.s. "Niki" has arrived from Smyrna with 600 civilian prisoners, who had been retained as hostages by the Turks. A number of wounded Greek officers also returned by the same boat.

According to the figures of the latest census, the number of refugees now in Greece is 900,000. Of these 67,000 remain in Athens, 52,000 in Piræus, and 86,000 in Salonika. Refugees of independent means are not included in these figures.

According to official statistics, the total population of the Karagatch district, which, in conformity with the Greco-Turkish agreement at Lausanne, will be handed over to Turkey, amounts to 16,700, the majority of whom are refugees from Western Thrace.

Mr. John H. Finley, editor of the New York Times, and Vice-President of the Near East Relief Organisation, left on Thursday for Constantinople after spending a week in Greece. Mr. Finley, who is the President of the United States Pedestrian Association, walked from Marathon to Athens under a blazing July sun, covering the distance of about 25½ miles in less than six hours.

At the English Church of St. Paul's, Athens, on June 14 the marriage was celebrated between Mr. J. Harold Clarke and Miss Vasiliki Dimopoulos. The ceremony was performed by the Resident Chaplain, Rev. W. W. Wigram. After the ceremony at the English Church the Greek religious service was held at the house of the bridegroom.

IRAK.

Baghdad, July 5.

The Shiah Ulema.

The outstanding incident of the past few days in Irak has been the commencement of a trial of strength between the Government and the Shiah Ulema as a result of the continued opposition of the latter to participation in the election for the Constituent Assembly. So far the Government appears to have won, but the situation will have to be carefully watched for some time, as it is improbable that the Ulema will be content to leave things as they are without making any effort to rouse the Shiah tribes into action against the Government.

Since the signing of the protocol providing for the early evacuation of this country by the British forces the Irak Government has realised clearly the importance of holding the elections at an early date, has busied itself with the necessary preparations, and has done its best to dissuade those who, a year ago, showed a tendency towards non-participation. A few days ago, however, notices—the authorship of which was traced to Sheikh Mahdi al Khalisi, the leading olim of Kazimain, a Persian by nationality, and one who has had a hand in most of the political intrigues with which this country has been cursed during the past two years—were posted in the mosques and on the tombs of the Imams. The tenour of the notices was definitely anti-Government, and, after some deliberation, it was decided to strike at once and to strike hard. Sheikh Mahdi al Khalisi and his two sons were, therefore, arrested and sent to Basrah for deportation. This decision was taken by the Council of Ministers and the arrest carried out entirely by Irak Government officials, and the incident is therefore especially noteworthy as being the first action of real importance which the Irak Government has done through its own officials, and this fact will doubtless do much to increase its prestige and to persuade the sceptics that it is not as impotent as they would have people believe.

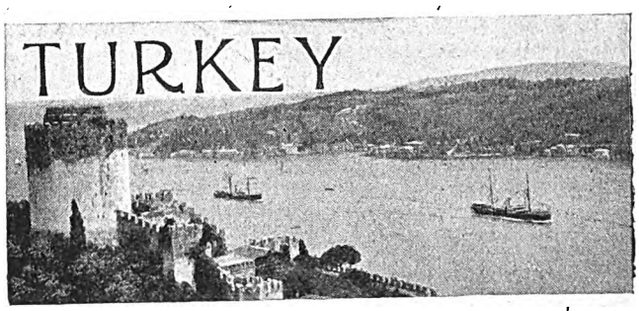
The Government's Action.

In view of the very close connection between politics and religion among the Shiahs, there was a distinct possibility that the Shiah tribes might regard this action as a direct blow at the Shiah community in general, and might be moved to take open action against the Government in consequence. Except, however, for one or two small sections of tribes in the Kerbela district, which put out their banners for a day, but almost immediately took them down again, the tribes appear to have taken little or no notice of the event—a fact which is significant as showing the extent to which the influence of the Ulema has decreased owing to the unscrupulous way in which they have of late years sacrificed their position as religious leaders to become the tools of political intriguers.

The only visible result of the Government's action has been the decision of a very small party of the Persian Ulema of Kerbela and Nejef to return to their homes in Persia. It is to be hoped that Persia will be as pleased to receive them as Irak is to be rid of them.

The King's Tour.

The King has recently made an extensive tour of the country, visiting, first, Mosul, and then Kut, Amarah, Basrah, Nasiriyah, and Diwaniyah. He appears to have been well received, though in some places the number of complaints put forward is said to have been not inconsiderable.



Constantinople, July 3.

Russo-Turkish Relations.

ment. Angora is very busy smelling out Communists and deporting them. Also the breakdown of maritime communications between Constantinople and Black Sea ports in Russian or Turkish ships shows no sign of being patched up. Since the "Bul Djemal" incident in Batoum Angora has refused to allow any goods to be landed in Turkish ports from vessels flying the Soviet's flag. The pother has arisen over the attempt by the Russians to arrogate for their Trade Delegation in Constantinople the rights appertaining to a regularly appointed diplomatic or consular representation. The Turks refused to play up by recognising the necessity of the visa of the Trade Delegation for the import of goods into Russia on Turkish ships, and bluntly told the Russians that they did not recognise any of their consular or other representatives, and saw to it that they took down their official-looking name-plates and retired into private life. The present feeling is one of acute hostility, and has a touch of Gilbertian humour in it, for the Soviet officials know that they owe their comparative immunity from persecution in Constantinople solely to the Allied occupation, and they are dreading the day when their protectors, the hated capitalist Western Powers, will leave them to the devices of the Turks.

July 9.

The Control of Travellers.

The chief local topic of interest during the past week has been the new regulations for the control of travellers which the Government put into operation in a fit of enthusiastic energy, apparently without consulting or forewarning their Constantinople representatives, who would have to face the music when the impracticability of them became obvious. It has not been possible to discover exactly of what the new regulations consisted, but it seems that they enacted that any foreigner, except Allied subjects, was bound to obtain the express authority of Angora to enable him to enter or to leave Turkey. A most effective measure if it was intended to establish a sort of cordon sanitaire round the rest of the world, for it is a complicated and slow business getting a reply out of Angora, and very often the Turkish representatives abroad fail to get any reply at all. The immediate result of the regulations was that various foreigners were hauled out of the Orient express at the frontier, a perfectly ghastly spot with no accommodation whatever, and various interested diplomatic personages put on their best clothes and went to see Adnan Bey. The American High Commissioner and representatives of the Swedes, Norwegians, Belgians, and so on followed one another in quick succession to Adnan's front door, and expressed themselves rather vigorously on the subject. Hence a rapid exchange of communications with the Government, and a new set of modifications is published. As far as it is possible to reconcile the various versions, it seems fairly clear that the status quo ante has been re-established until the end of the current month as far as Allied and American subjects are concerned, and all that they require is the usual visa from the Consulate which looks after Turkish interests. Another version extends this temporary facility to all foreigners, with the exception of Russians, Bulgarians, Greeks, Albanians, Georgians, and Azerbaijanlis, whose cases have to be referred individually to Angora.

It was refreshing to see that even the Turkish Press, which is not distinguished by a rabidly independent spirit, made some rather peevish comments about the Government's inconsiderate habit of multiplying edicts and counter-edicts. The protest was not very strongly made, but perhaps one cannot expect too much in a country which is kept in order by the elastic law of lèse-patrie, which will punish a multitude of sins.

An Amusing Rumour.

Another little storm in a tea-cup was raised by the categorical statements of some of the Turkish papers that a memorial had been handed to the British High Commissioner by certain inhabitants, including some Turks, asking for the maintenance of the Allied Military Occupation. The story was allowed a run of several days, for which everyone was profoundly grateful, since the cumulative reports of the affair made amusing reading, and then the Havas-Reuter Agency roughly squashed it by publishing a démenti from the High Commission.

The Patriarchate.

The affair of the Patriarchate has taken a decided turn, and the present incumbent is definitely retiring to Mount Athos. The affairs of the Patriarchate will be managed by the permanent Councils of the Patriarchate under the presidency of a locum tenens, and it is reported that a delegation of the Greek Orthodox community will proceed to Angora for consultation with the Government concerning the choice of a new Patriarch.

Meanwhile the Stamboul law courts are solemnly debating the action for libel brought by the troublesome M. Damianidis, who is annoyed with the decree of excommunication launched against him by the Patriarch. While this farce is being carried on, the Turkish authorities with the other hand have given the Patriarch an official Turkish permit to leave the country and place himself outside the jurisdiction of the Court, thus displaying a good deal more common sense than they have been in the habit of doing for some months past.

Events at Lausanne.

The news of the agreement reached at Lausanne has just arrived, and comments on the manner in which it has been received here will have to be deferred, for nobody has yet had time to look around and take stock of the situation. But although criticism of the terms on which peace is about to be concluded may be considered premature until we have had time to see how the Turks are going to make use of their newly-won independence, it is certainly permissible to point out that the most prominent characteristic of the Treaty will be its omissions. To be quite frank, it transfers the conflict between Turkey and the Powers from the military to the economic plane, and from that point of view it must be considered as a quasi-settlement of limited scope, and leaves affairs in a state of suspended animation until the debt and concessions questions are definitely settled.

Whatever the defects of the proposed Peace Treaty—and they are many and various—it has one undeniable merit. The Turks, and the Turks alone, are responsible for the future of their country. The Great Powers have definitely acquiesced in a situation in which the Turkish Government will be face to face not with a set of hostile Powers bent on recovering reparations and debts, but with a corpus of business men who will treat with them on a purely business footing over the financial questions now in suspense.

ENGLAND AND INDIA.

We referred briefly last week to the first public gathering of the British-Indian Union, an organisation which aims at promoting a better mutual understanding between the two countries. The object is one which can be commended without reserve, and the scope for action is ample, or even embarrassingly wide. To cover the entire ground would indeed require a treatise rather than an article, and to-day we propose to invite the attention of our readers mainly to that section of it where the immediate danger arising from misunderstanding appears to us to be greatest, the failure of Indian politicians in the mass to appreciate the attitude of the British nation towards India, and the objects which it is seeking to attain. Regarding these objects, there is no room for doubt. It has been made perfectly plain that all important sections of the nation are agreed in the determination to give Indians a fair chance of developing a wholesome national life on democratic lines; but when we judge Indian public men, as we are bound to do, by the record of their votes and speeches in the Legislature, we are driven to the conclusion that they are looking to England to support them in establishing the oligarchy of a microscopic minority. Long before they have made use of the opportunities already granted, they are clamouring for extended powers for themselves, they are acting on the assumption that such clamour must necessarily be successful, and they are ignoring the basic fact that a much wider franchise must precede the grant of appreciably wider powers. Were they working in intellectual harmony with us, they would be devoting their time on the one hand to pressing for the early enfranchisement of more voters, and on the other to educating the people to whom votes might be given: as a matter of fact, the franchise is the one political question which leaves them absolutely cold, political education has scarcely been attempted, and, judging them on their record, they aspire not to lead the masses, but to rule them as they were ruled by Aladdin or Aurangzeb.

We think it right to say this quite plainly, but we have no intention of apportioning blame for what is in fact a natural development. The present attitude of Indian politicians springs directly from the evil past. We ask them to realise that England has undertaken to break with that past, not to revive it under another name, and to introduce the working rule of democracy to which they have long been accustomed to render lip-service. Probably they would be more ready to transform their homage into action if they possessed a more vivid knowledge of the real past of India. Let us state that past in the form of a parable. Rather more than a century ago England found India sinking deeper and deeper in a pit of indescribable filth. England pulled her out, and has since been endeavouring to make her presentable. The effort has so far succeeded that it has been possible to introduce her to the society of the nations; but in the meantime she has forgotten all about the pit, and at present she is concerned mainly to blame her rescuer for the dirt which has not yet been removed. We do not claim that England has always acted with entire wisdom in her relations with India. There have been times when it might have been better to use a hose instead of a sponge; some garments were scarcely worth washing, and might advantageously have been burned; but the broad fact remains that India now occupies a position which, even fifty years ago, would have been unthinkable, and for that very reason the men who aspire to lead her onwards are called upon to make efforts and sacrifices of which their predecessors did not dream. We appeal to them, therefore, to endeavour to realise the true purpose of England in the light of Indian history. To our eyes, the road which the majority of Indian legislators have recently been following leads directly back to the pit from which India has escaped. We do not deny its attractions at the moment, the smooth surface, or the easy downward gradient. Its fault is simply that it leads in the wrong direction, and that every step taken along it will sooner or later have to be retraced.

Perhaps it may assist Indian politicians in obtaining a juster grasp of the situation if we point out that many of them are under an illusion regarding the attitude of the Labour Party in this country. We concede that there has been some excuse for this illusion in the past. The wild men on the left flank have talked wildly, as their habit is, and, in their eagerness to discredit their opponents, have made promises which Indians have been too ready to accept at their face-value. But the Labour Party, taken as a whole, does not consist of wild men; it is gaining rapidly in steadiness and solidity, and the policy of the Labour Ministry, if and when it comes into existence, will be determined not by the freelances on the left, but by sober-minded men, rather stupid, perhaps, when judged by Indian standards, but perfectly able to appreciate plain facts, and convinced believers in the democratic principles of whose triumph they are the most conspicuous evidence. It is possible they may administer democracy to India in doses so large as to try the patient's constitution; it is unthinkable that they should sacrifice their principles by doing anything to maintain or strengthen the privileges of the few. We ask Indian politicians, then, to realise that the English objective of democracy is not likely to change. The process may vary in pace with temporary fluctuations in opinion, but the direction will not be reversed, until at least the failure of democracy shall have been demonstrated as a fact. It is open to Indians to reject democracy altogether, but so long as they accept the theory, affirmed for so many years in their voluminous programmes, their duty is to work for its realisation in practice by helping to bring into existence an electorate sufficiently large and sufficiently informed to bear the weight of a more extensive system of self-government. The clamour for new powers does more than anything else to discourage those Englishmen who have worked for India's advance. What they look for eagerly is the acceptance of new duties, and the rising to increased responsibilities. Satisfy them that Indians are working on these lines, and they will not be backward in pressing for the grant of still greater opportunities of service.

CHANGING THE NAME.

By X. N. O.

The recent decision of the new Turkish Government to change the name of the St. Sophia Mosque and call it the Mehemedje Mosque must assuredly cause much bitter heartburning amongst those who know and love the massive pile at the gateway of the Bosphorus.

There is no religious building in the world that has passed through so many vicissitudes in the passage of time, and yet survived triumphantly and with so little loss to its former state.

Built in the fourth century by the Emperor Constantine as a Christian church, originally a plain Basilica, it was destroyed forty years later, only to be rebuilt in 415 A.D., when it stood for over 100 years until burnt down. Out of the ashes of the original Basilica rose up the huge edifice as it now stands. Under the personal supervision of the great Emperor Justinian, one hundred architects, each having under him one hundred labourers, worked for nearly five years to complete this cathedral, the most glorious jewel in Justinian's crown. The dome, curiously enough, is almost exactly the same size as the dome of St. Paul's, but the lightness of its support gives it an appearance of greater vastness. Completed in 537 A.D., the church was dedicated to The Divine Wisdom on Christmas Day of that year.

For over 900 years St. Sophia remained the seat of the Patriarchate and the cathedral of the Eastern Church, during which time Constantinople had changed hands more than once. Suddenly, like a bolt from the blue, Mohammed the Conqueror arrived at the head of his victorious army, and, putting the city to the sack, rode into St. Sophia at the head of his troops while Mass was in progress. There, legend has it, astride his war horse on the top of a heap of the slain, he proclaimed the creed of his faith.

From that day to this, St. Sophia, or Aya Sofia, as it is more properly called by the Turk, has been devoted to the worship of Islam. To the best of their power they removed all traces of its former Christian decorations. Elaborate mosaics depicting Christ, the six-winged Cherubim, and portions of Old and New Testament history were whitewashed over, and the massive door hinges, originally fashioned in the shape of a crucifix, were mutilated and made to represent tridents where the Cross had been before. Try how they might, however, to efface all traces of its Christian origin there were many features, the most salient ones, they were powerless to change. The position of the pillars supporting the great dome formed the outline of a Greek cross, and, like all Christian churches, the apse lay east and west. This rather upset the Moslem ruling that houses of prayer must face towards Mecca. The difficulty was partly overcome in St. Sophia by putting up the Mihrab, or altar, some way further to the southward of where the altar of the Greek church had been and adjusting the praying mats accordingly. This transformation was rendered more easily possible by the fact that the altar is a movable fixture in all Eastern churches.

The position of the original altar, however, is clearly indicated by a mosaic of Christ, which was above it, with arms outstretched towards the centre of the building. This mosaic, also white-washed over on the church's conversion to a mosque, is the subject of a curious superstition.

Fable has it that the reappearance of the figure of Christ through its covering of white-wash would coincide with the overthrow of the Ottoman Empire. I remember in this connection that, on visiting the mosque of St. Sophia a few days after the armistice with Turkey was signed in 1918, an Armenian pointed out the mosaic, which was just discernible in certain lights. He told me of the superstition concerning it with much awe and not a little foreboding, for Turkey's ultimate fate had not then been decided.

The ardent revolutionaries who are the backbone of the present movement are to a man in favour of altering everything which may remind them of the European influence over Constantinople. The city has from time to time passed through the hands of far greater men than these—the Greeks, Latins, Crusaders, and lastly the old Ottoman régime—and all these were content to leave St. Sophia's name unchanged.

Though welcome to the extremists of the present party, one can rest assured that its new name of Mehemedje Mosque will mean nothing to the fine-featured, white-bearded, grave old Turks, resembling almost exactly the figures in Sunday School wall pictures, who sit, day in and day out, "drinking" their narghilehs outside the Stamboul coffee-houses. For them nothing changes, and innovation is heresy.

To heighten the Moslem appearance of the interior, the early conquerors hung up round the dome those great green and gold plaques so familiar to visitors to the mosque. The conquerors of the present generation, not content with altering the appearance of the building, wish to change its name.

How the marble pillars much chuckle to themselves—if pillars can have a sense of humour! Those pillars that are so permanent a part of the structure when compared to plaques and names, and yet are so cosmopolitan, brought as they were by the founders from far-flung temples of all creeds and faiths—temples of Christ, Mahommed, Pallas, Apollo, the Asiatic Cybele, and Egyptian Isis and Osiris. What does a name matter to them?

THE WORLD'S DAME SCHOOL.

"OPPRESSED PEOPLES AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS." By Noel Buxton and T. P. Conwil-Evans (London, J. M. Dent & Sons. 6s. net.)

The Treaty of Sèvres was an admirable document in all but one particular, it dealt with Turkey without taking into consideration the Turks. As far as the purpose of this book is disclosed, the reader is left with a suspicion that the authors would apply the same policy to the world at large. The nations are to be sent to a Dame-school kept by Granny League, a successor to Madame Europa. Now compulsory education is an admirable system, but it is based in the last resort on physical force, applied to the errant or recalcitrant by a stronger arm. Consequently, if the nations of the world are sent to school just at the moment when the youngest of them are convinced that they have arrived at man's estate and have done with school and even family discipline, there is likely to be some jibbing, and provision must be made for the necessary compulsion. No doubt such a prospect raises no misgivings with the Labour Party, accustomed to the discipline of Trades Unions, but it necessarily handicaps any scheme for the millennium in the minds of practical people. If the events of the last four years have proved anything, it is that self-will has followed hard on the heels of self-determination, and that where any single nation is inclined to kick over the traces nothing but war or the imminence of war is likely to win it to reasonableness. In these circumstances the elaboration of counsels of perfection for compelling the world to be good are apt to be waste of time, as no force is available for the compulsion.

With a view to setting Internationalism on a pedestal, our authors have to demolish Nationalism and Imperialism. The former is accorded a grudging tribute in so far as it has been the means of liberating the peoples from dominions they disliked; now it has to be "damped down." Imperialism is judged and condemned, because the individual records of a settler here and there in Australia or South Africa leave something to be desired—surely very flimsy grounds for maintaining that British Imperialism has been a greater force for evil than for good. On this point, as on others, our authors seem to suffer from inability to see the wood owing to the size of the trees, resembling an art-critic passing judgment on a poster which he has examined only under a microscope.

If we follow the authors of this book correctly, the world is to be set right by Internationalism, acting through the League of Nations, which will employ, as far as possible, the British Empire, purged of all its evil characteristics by the Labour Party. The mandatory system is to stand, and to be extended, but "The League should inaugurate a system of supervision by its own inspectors, who should, of course, not be nationals of the mandatory." There is also to be a civil service recruited from the various States which are members of the League, and a Minorities Commission will be in charge of the interests of the oppressed or weak racial minorities, and in countries like Egypt will also be responsible for protecting strong and healthy minorites, i.e., Europeans. It is not clear whether the authors have reflected that, as the League of Nations can represent only the will of the signatories of the Covenant, possibly some or all of them may object to intensifying the League's discipline, and to the introduction of the form of espionage recommended. In the absence of a Labour Government, or, perhaps, in the event of its falling short of all that is predicated of it, the Anti-Slavery Society is to obviate "such grievances as those to which the base elements in British Imperialism might in the future give rise."

By the time the reader comes to the chapter on "The Middle Eastern Peoples" he is prepared for the enforcement of international discipline. Under the heading of "Neo-Manchesterism" the "extreme Labour Press" has been trounced severely for urging "the immediate bestowal of full independence and immediate withdrawal by the dominating Power." If restrictions are necessary to national expression in Europe, we are told, they are imperative in the case of most Eastern peoples, as, for example, the Egyptians and Arabs, "who, whatever may be their capabilities in other respects, are not equipped for an immediate experiment in democracy." The Labour Party is to reconcile itself to this doctrine by reflecting that "those who cry loudest for total independence are often landlords and property owners, representing forces to which, as a rule, labour is distinctly hostile." Accordingly, the Eastern peoples, whether they like it or not, are to be kept under tutelage, and the reader is left to infer that our authors would be prepared to recommend a Labour Government to undertake a war to keep these people under tutelage for their good. (On page 149 war with Turkey in 1922 is contemplated with complacency. "It was still in the power of the Allies, or indeed in that of the chief naval Power alone, to impose a settlement which justice dictates.") Much that is written about the Arab world is to the point, but little allowance is made for the difficulty of forcing Eastern peoples into a mandatory mould without the prospect of a long period of unrest. As for the Turks, "is is a hard fact that a certain measure of interference in Turkey is demanded by reason and justice. It would be unworthy of true internationalism to ignore history, to apply idealistic solutions in defiance of facts, above all, to hand over large and suffering minorities, as part and parcel of our reaction against the Imperialism of the Allies, to an Imperialism infinitely more abominable. The Labour Party, to its credit, has not lost its head. . . ."

From the quotations given it will be seen that the book ranges over a wide field. A further chapter deals with Japan and Korea. In so far as the authors provide food for thought in regard to an important subject, they have done well; but we imagine that most of their readers will be of opinion that there is no short cut to the millennium, and that this generation will have to be content to know that slowly, painfully, but steadily, it is toiling upwards, leaving the world distinctly better off than it found it.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Letters intended for publication MUST be accompanied by the writer's full name and address, not necessarily for publication, but as an evidence of good faith. They should be worded as briefly as possible and must be written on one side of the paper.

THE CENTRAL ASIAN SOCIETY.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—In the early post-War period, when reconstruction was the order of the day in all or most institutions of this and other countries, you were so good as to place at the disposal of the Central Asian Society the columns of THE NEAR EAST, in order that that Society might reconstruct itself on the wider basis which the changed conditions in the Near and Middle East, brought about by time and the War, placed at its disposal.

As a matter of fact, as I judge, the famous old "Central Asian Question," which seemed to resolve itself into the one issue: "Was Britain or Russia to be dominant in Asia?" found its grave in the Anglo-Russian agreement of 1907; and when that Agreement became a ruin, even the grave ceased to be recognisable. Compare the Central Asia of the opening years of this or the closing years of the last century with the Central Asia of to-day! When I was last there I found Czarist Russia developing the country steadily and effectively. I was at the Tashkent Exhibition of 1890, and there I saw, not "milk and honey," as in the Mosaic days, but coal, and wine, and cotton—and oil. I doubt not, lay low somewhere. If quiet progress had been the order of the day in the years that followed, we can realise how the communications of that territory by rail, steamboat, car, and air would have been developed, and, being developed, have contributed to the expansion of industry in it, and to its wealth and welfare. All that has been nipped in the bud by the release from control of revolutionary forces, the ruthlessness of which experience alone has enabled us to realise.

The Central Asian Society has endeavoured, since the termination of the War, so to organise itself that it may with justice be regarded as an authority on Asia and Asiatic affairs, and especially on all that concerns those countries upon the sound administration of which depends easy communication between Great Britain and its Overseas Dominions. As far as I can judge, the Suez Canal is the key of that vital line of communication. A good deal of chaff, sometimes good-humoured, sometimes almost acrid, has been levelled at the "Central Asian" Society, when its tentacles have been seen to embrace the Far East on the one side and a goodly share of Africa on the other. The fact is that the great political and social and commercial questions of the day are not limited by the arbitrary conventions of geographers. Anyone can see that Africa, from the Cape to Cairo, will become a powerful factor in the maintenance of British power on the Suez Canal and on the countries which immediately border upon that Canal. The Cape to Cairo Railway will inevitably be completed, and as long as South and East Africa remain loyal to the Mother Country, that railway will, in any hour of need, take possibly disloyal forces in rear, and paralyse their action. And let me add that, whatever view may be taken of the Jew and Arab controversy in Palestine, it is surely obvious that British control of Palestine is essential to the maintenance of communication with Great Britain's possessions in Asia and Australasia. It is certainly matter for profound regret that the descendants of Sarah and Hagar cannot live in amity together; but, after all, as Lord Milner said at the last annual dinner of the Central Asian Society, it has been found possible to induce hostile races to live in peace under a just administration.

It is matter for sincere regret that the onerous Parliamentary and secretarial duties of the Honorary President of the Central Asian Society, the Marquess Curzon of Kedleston, prevent him from presiding at those annual dinners. When he did preside, on October 12, 1920, he made a speech which I certainly have not forgotten and shall not forget. Furthermore, I have endeavoured to keep the memory of it green. He reminds members of the Central Asian Society that the lectures and the journal are but preparatives, and that their great work is to be done by themselves in the vast field of action which British stakes and interests in the Near and Middle and Far East lay open to them. It is my earnest hope that in the future the memory of this good counsel will hold firm, and that the Society whose welfare we have at heart will continue to be for many years to come a "Pillar of the Empire."—I am, etc.,

THE FRENCH AND THE TURKISH DEBT.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—A London daily certainly not noted for being pro-Turk the other day compared the French attitude over the Turkish Debt with the position they have taken up over reparations and the Ruhr. The two things are not quite on a par, but, so far the Turkish point of view has had no publicity in the Press. Here it is, concentrated and divested of diplomatic rhetoric.

All over the world the Great War has brought about an entirely new set of values. All sorts of solemn engagements have been forgotten by all sides, and impossible promises have been made all round which it is now seen to be impossible to keep. America and, to a limited extent, Great Britain can be considered to be on a gold basis, but the rest of Europe is now conducting its State life on paper of various degrees of depreciation. Loans to Turkey before the War (in France conducted under a kind of State patronage) may have mentioned gold, as they did also fixed rates between sterling, francs, and English pounds. But they did so merely as a matter of convenience from a coupon-paying point of view, since these were payable in Constantinople, as well as in Paris and in London, at the correct gold based rates of £10 = £tqs 11 = Frs. 250.

French investors lent Turkey francs; they also lent their own Government francs, and the French Government now pays interest and capital to its own people in francs, and not a larger number of francs, because the franc is now worth only about a third of what it used to be worth as reckoned in sterling. Why, therefore, the Turks ask, does the French Government insist on Turkey's paying French investors back on a sterling basis—i.e., about three times as many francs—when France herself only pays its own people in francs? The Turks are prepared to pay the French in francs, in French francs, and they cannot see the logic of having to pay the French about three times as many francs just because francs are down when reckoned in sterling. "If it comes to that," they say, "pounds Turkish are down, too, to about a sixth of what they were worth in sterling." The Turks do not suggest paying the French in depreciated Turkish currency. They are willing to pay France in francs, the francs she invested being considered by the French Government itself as the same as the francs now circulating. Unless France starts to consider the present franc as being only a third of a franc and acts up to this in France, then Turkey will refuse to pay anything but francs pur et simple.

Quite apart from the above reasoning, Turkey simply could not afford to pay her debt at an artificially increased figure of three times its franc value. The Turkish Budget before the War was about £tqs30,000,000 per annum. This represented about £27,000,000. At the present time the Turkish Budget is considerably less than £tqs30,000,000 paper, which only means about £5,000,000. Possibly with peace—even with Turkey's greatly reduced territory—some increase may be brought about, but it will be obvious that, by agreeing to pay in French francs, Turkey is almost doing the impossible. It is, therefore, useless to even think about a sterling basis.

That is the Turkish case, and the Turks think it unanswerable both as to what they ought to pay and as to what they can pay.—I am, etc.,

PALESTINE POLITICS.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—In spite of our divergent views on this topic, may I be permitted once more to refer to it in your columns?

Lord Milner has recently expressed his opinion that Arab agitation in Palestine does not rest on legitimate grievances. Now let us lay aside all Arab allegations about broken promises, and, for the sake of brevity, consider only one example of Arab grievances. Under the proposed Constitution Arab Moslems would be under-represented by over forty per cent. The considered opinion of a British statesman is that this is not a legitimate grievance. What, therefore, does constitute a legitimate grievance?

Arabs will entirely agree with Lord Milner that an impartial and disinterested government is essential for the peace of Palestine, and it is in order to obtain such a government that they are now agitating.—I am, etc.,

THE ROYAL ASIATIC SOCIETY.

The Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland was founded by the distinguished Sanskrit scholar Henry Thomas Colebrooke in March, 1823, with the enthusiastic co-operation of all Oriental scholars and others in England interested in the East, and received the Royal Charter in 1824, under which it is governed by a council of twenty-five. Its object was to investigate the history, polity, customs, languages, literature, science, and arts of Asia, with the hope of facilitating ameliorations there and advancing knowledge and benefiting commerce and the arts at home. For these purposes it opened correspondence with the East to collect and disseminate information, not only on the antiquarian and literary sides, but also in favour of trade and practical affairs.

It met mostly monthly, and papers were read before it. These were published at first in three volumes of "Transactions" till 1833, and since then in an annual journal. It also started an Oriental Translation Fund, and issued many volumes of important Oriental works. Public interest afterwards flagged, yet was partially aroused by the famous discoveries of cuneiform inscriptions in Persia by Sir Henry Rawlinson in 1838, which the society championed during the first wave of incredulity and published in its journals. During the following decades of the century, however, and especially after the abolition of the East India Company, want of interest in Oriental matters among the public seriously straitened its means and restricted its activities. But after 1877 interest increased among the educated, and the society has steadily grown in numbers stability, and influence, so that it has been able to propose or itself to undertake various beneficial projects. Thus it has established funds to award a gold medal triennially to a distinguished British Oriental scholar and another annually for competition by essays among public school boys, and to publish important works on Oriental subjects free of cost to the authors. It now comprises 971 members, 165 subscribing libraries, and 34 eminent foreign scholars as honorary members, and has a most valuable Oriental library of some 30,000 volumes and manuscripts.

A four days' celebration of the centenary of the society commenced in London on July 17, when the Prince of Wales attended an inaugural reception of the delegates at Burlington House. A Government luncheon was given to the delegates at Claridge's Hotel the same day, after which the four main sections—the Far Eastern, Semitic, Sumerian, Hittite, and Egyptian, Indian, and Islamic—held their first meetings at the rooms of the society, 74, Grosvenor Street. Yesterday afternoon a visit was paid to the School of Oriental Studies, followed by a reception by the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House. The programme for Thursday afternoon (the mornings are devoted to sectional meetings) includes a visit to Oxford or attendance at a reception of the British and Foreign Bible Society. To-morrow night Lord Chalmers, president of the society, will preside at a banquet at the Hotel Cecil.

A recently-published centenary volume, edited by Mr. F. E. Pargiter, gives a history of the Royal Asiatic Society.

It is announced that the Treaty of the Defensive Alliance concluded on July 7, 1921, between Roumania and Yugoslavia has been renewed for another period of three years. The original treaty, it will be remembered, was designed to prevent any attempt on the part of Hungary or of Bulgaria to upset the treaties of Trianon or Neuilly.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London,
Tuesday Morning.

The Monsoon.

Anxiety continues with regard to the monsoon, the latest news being far from encouraging. The rains have been heavy on the west coast of India, but inadequate elsewhere, and failing a rapid improvement it is inevitable that the crops will be moderate. That outcome will, of course, mean that for another year the purchasing power of India will be restricted, which is anything but a pleasant outlook for Lancashire, though it is always possible that conditions will favour the development of a demand for cotton goods in other quarters.

This Year's Harvests.

While the prospects of the Indian harvest remain uncertain, the outlook in Europe has greatly improved during the past week or so. A hot spell was the one hope of the languishing crops, and a heat-wave obligingly came along, to the discomfort of most Europeans, to say nothing of the inhabitants of this country, who have not realised that it has probably saved them from much worse troubles. The result has been that poor forecasts have been hastily altered to something quite different, and, provided conditions are favourable, there seems every likelihood of bumper crops over a great part of Europe. The reports are particularly favourable with regard to the Near East, where, if expectations are realised, there should be a large surplus of grain to support the weak exchanges.

Higher Bank Rate Success.

That an alteration in the Bank rate is still a highly efficacious corrective of adverse financial conditions is evident from the continued improvement in the sterling exchange quotation in New York since the rate was raised to 4 per cent. At the same time, the flow of money to the other side has declined, so that both the principal objects of the change are well on the way to being realised. There has been a good deal of criticism of the increase, it may be pointed out, on the ground that it will act as a check on any trade revival. I do not think, however, that there is any solid substance for this view, for, judging by past experience, a 4 per cent. rate should not make much difference one way or the other, and, in any case, trade is at such a low ebb just now that one can scarcely speak with any propriety of checking it.

The Montenegrin Loan Service.

Apropos of the question of the service of the Montenegrin Loan, to which I have already referred in these columns, it may be noted that provision has been made in the Yugoslav supplementary Budget estimates for the service of the current coupons. This fact should remove the last vestige of anxiety on the part of the bondholders. No decision has yet been arrived at as regards the arrears of interest, but no doubt in this case, too, an equitable settlement will be reached.

The Export Credits Scheme.

It cannot be said that the statement recently issued giving particulars of the export credits scheme is in any way an encouraging document; in fact, the impression can legitimately be drawn from it that the scheme is inadequate for the purpose of assisting trade in the present unprecedented conditions. A total amount of £26,000,000, it will be remembered, was authorised for the purposes of the scheme, and the total of the credits granted, £13,346,319, is, prima facie, extremely satisfactory. But the amount that has actually been utilised is only a little over three million pounds, which speaks volumes as to the actual trade situation. The real fact is, of course, that it is impossible indefinitely to stimulate trade by artificial expedients. A scheme such as this would have been, and may yet be, of the greatest utility in the development of commerce when the external indications point very plainly to the early return to something approaching normal conditions; but in a long period of depression, and in the face of adverse exchanges, only the supreme optimist could anticipate really satisfactory results.

The P. and O. Banking Corporation.

The progress made by the P. and O. Banking Corporation in the comparatively short period that it has been in existence has been most remarkable, especially when due consideration is taken of the prevailing commercial conditions. During the year ended March 31 last the business of the bank continued to expand. The total figures of the balance-sheet rose from £13,000,000 to £22,500,000: the current, deposit, and other accounts rose from £6,316,000 to £10,000,000, while the bank's cash position is very strong, liquid balances being maintained of nearly £5,000,000, representing about 50 per cent. of the demand liabilities. In his speech at the annual general meeting of the bank Lord Inchcape laid stress on the prudent policy of the board, saying that they intended to go cautiously, avoiding risks as far as possible, gradually working up what they hoped would be a sound and lucrative business, and building up reserves. Turning to the trade situation, he pointed out that Europe was India's best customer, and emphasised the need for settled conditions there in the interests of the trade of India, of this country, and of the world generally. In his opinion, this country will gain far more by a settled Europe than by anything in the way of Reparations that we are likely to get from Germany.

ROUMANIAN FINANCES.

Budget Equilibrium Reached.

The Roumanian Minister and Mme. Titulescu were "At home" on the afternoon of July 11 to a number of representatives of the Press to enable them to hear a speech by M. Vintila Bratianu, Roumanian Minister of Finance, on present conditions in Roumania. M. Bratianu described the conditions in Roumania immediately after the Armistice, when the country was quite unable to maintain itself and had to resort to a number of financial expedients in order to carry on.

Its difficulties were two-fold—political and financial. It was handicapped by being a collection of four different units—the old kingdom, Transylvania, Bukovina, and Bessarabia, with different administrative systems, different fiscal systems. In 1919 loans were essential to enable the country to live. Further, the issues of paper money during the enemy occupation, as well as the Austrian money, had to be absorbed. It was not until 1923 that it was possible for remedial legislation to have any actual effect. It would be seen that they were now getting back in Roumania to a state of normal production. The Budget had reached equilibrium while covering ordinary needs, at the same time allowing a certain expenditure on railway improvements. It might be said that the railways at the moment were equal to all demands, although by no means in the condition that they ought to be in and would eventually reach. Here, again, they were confronted with the difficulty of railways belonging to four different systems based on four different centres, and Roumania's railway programme in future would consist in unifying these four systems in one. The object of the new constitution had been to harmonise all the various systems represented in the new Greater Roumania, to enable the country to be run as a single whole, and to utilise its resources to the full. The Government held that the current rate of exchange did not correspond with the facts of Roumania's position, but at the same time they were most anxious to avoid violent fluctuations or too rapid a rise. One of the objects of his visit, M. Bratianu declared, was to arrange that Roumania should not be hindered by outside circumstances in her work of development. On the subject of reparations they felt that they were being called upon to postpone certain rights that they had under the treaties, but that they were not to enjoy any proportionate postponement of the obligations imposed upon the country by the same treaties. As far as Great Britain was concerned, he hoped that it would be recognised that Roumania was a country of considerable interest to manufacturers, and he hoped that in judging of her as a potential market business interests in this country would rely upon facts and not come to unfavourable conclusions on mere hearsay without seeing things for themselves.

The 1923 Budget.

Detailed figures of Roumania's financial position are given in a memorandum issued by M. Bratianu, from which we give the following extracts:—

The Budgets of the Old Kingdom showed a considerable surplus each year from 1901, the balance amounting on occasions to nearly 20 per cent. of the total. Thus, on an expenditure of 512 millions, the Budget of 1913-14 showed a surplus of more than 95 millions. The first Budget of Greater Roumania was that of 1919-20, a date which signalises the return to normal finance. It shows an expenditure of 5.2 milliards, as against receipts of 2 milliards. The Budgets of the last three years show a continued increase in expenditure, due to the increasing charges imposed on the State by the reorganisation of its services and the monetary depreciation. The deficit—a phenomenon almost universal among European States since the War—more than 3 milliards of lei in 1919-20, was only 2.6 milliards in 1920-21, and about 1 milliard in 1921-22.

In view of that series of deficits, of which the immediate consequences were the increase of the fiduciary circulation, the growth of the floating debt, and the weakness of the credit of the State, the first duty of the Roumanian Government was to take account of the real position of its services and to bring about at all costs the balancing of expenditure and receipts, an essential condition of all healthy finance. That was the underlying idea that governed the drawing-up and the carrying-out of the Budget of 1922-23, which showed an expenditure of 10.5 milliards of lei, an amount almost entirely covered by the ordinary revenues. This Budget maintained, generally, the characteristics of the Budgets of the Old Kingdom, and the pre-War fiscal system has only undergone slight modifications: an increase in direct taxation and in succession duties, the introduction of a tax on salaries, on movables, and on turnover, the increase of certain duties on consumption, and the raising of the tariff on monopolies.

The Budget of 1923 marks great progress compared with that of 1922-23. As regards the revenue, it embodies the reorganisation of direct contributions for the unification of direct taxation within the new frontiers of the country, for procuring important resources for the State and for assuring a more equitable distribution of public charges. The taxes accruing from fortunes inherited and income now represent one-fifth of the total amount of taxes against one-sixth in the previous Budget. As regards expenditure, it assures the well-being of the public services, and will well satisfy the country's needs. Here are the details of the Budget estimates (for nine months), the figures representing millions of lei:—Receipts: Direct taxation, 1,577; indirect taxation, 5,885; stamp duties and registration, 901; State monopolies, 1,770; industrial services (railways, etc.), 3,543; State domains, 606; sundry revenues, 1,124; total, 15,406. The heads of expenditure remain, broadly speaking, the same as in the Budget of 1922-23. The increase in expenditure—15,406 millions of lei for nine months, as against 7,873 for the same period of 1922-23—is due to (1) the service of the debt, which requires 2,659 millions of lei to meet the payment of interest and all external and internal obligations of the State; (2) the increase of the Budget allocations for the army—now at a strength of 125,000, a very small total when the extent of the Roumanian frontiers is borne in mind; (3) the increase in the salaries of officials to bring their emoluments into keeping with the rise in prices; (4) the growth in the expenditure on the railways and P.T.T.; (5) better public services in general, etc.

Oil Notes and News.

ROUMANIAN OIL POSITION IN 1922.

The recently issued British Consular Report on Roumania contains a comprehensive survey of conditions in the oil industry in 1922 by Mr. Louis Johnston, from which we quote the following :—

1,137,184 tons of crude oil were produced, as against 1,168,414 tons in 1921, being well under the 1,847,875 tons produced in 1913-14. The Prahova fields contributed approximately 78 per cent., viz. : Moreni, 45 per cent. ; Baicoiu, 10 per cent. ; Bustenari, 6 per cent. ; Campina, 5 per cent. ; Runcu-Scorteni, 4.70 per cent. ; Tintea, 3.40 per cent. ; and the balance of 3.90 per cent. from Chiciura, Bordeni, Recea and Filipesti de Padure. The Dambovitza fields contributed approximately 10 per cent. from Ochiuri Rasvad, and 2.85 per cent. from Gura Ocnitei. The Buzau fields contributed approximately 6.75 per cent., and Bacau 2.40 per cent

At the end of September, 1921, there were 777 producing wells, 410 others were being drilled, and 395 were suspended or abandoned. There were also 307 producing handshafts, 37 others were being deepened, and 280 were abandoned. The production was mostly obtained as usual by the Astra Romana, the Romano Americana, and the Steaua Romana.

As in previous years since the Armistice, throughout 1922 the supply of electric power was irregular, and the production from wells in bailing frequently suffered. Towards the end of the year the supply of electric power became regular. Production, as in previous years, was to a large extent maintained by fountain wells, mostly in Moreni. There was practically no "wild-catting," the companies concentrating on the known prolific areas. Except for the exploration of Copaceni by a Roumanian and a French company, practically no exploring for new oil strata has been done since 1918.

The Astra Romana (Shell group) had six flowing wells at Moreni, one of which had given nearly 300,000 tons. The same company obtained 80 tons daily from a well in Ochiuri, and the first good results since the war from the region of Campina Pitigaia. The Romano Americana (Standard Oil) had eight flowing wells in Moreni and two in Baicoiu. The Concordia company had a flowing well at Moreni and another at Runcu. The Phœnix company (British) had terrific eruptions from a Moreni well, obtaining as much as 1,500 tons in twenty-four hours, and the same company had a flowing well at Runcu. The Colombia company had eruptions almost all through the year from their Moreni well No. 6, the production from which increased as time went on. Other flowing wells were brought in by the Dacia Company (British) and the Credit Minier (Roumanian) at Moreni, by the Romania Petrolifera (Roumanian) at Gropi, and by the Steaua Romana and the Orion companies at Runcu.

The price of crude oil at the beginning of the year was very weak, and refining was not a paying business for reasons stated, with the result that most of the refiners without their own crude oil production closed down. Towards the early summer, owing to the expectation of higher maximal prices for products for internal consumption, crude oil became firm, and the closed refineries reopened. In August the price of crude oil was influenced by a drop in the American oil market, and Bustenari quality was negotiated at lei 1,800 per ton. From October to December the price of crude oil was rising.

Drilling Activity.

Drilling was handicapped all through the year by the irregular supply of electric power, by shortage of labour, by bad weather, which prevented transport of material, and—not least—by the fall in currency, which rendered material expensive in lei. Nevertheless, there was more drilling in 1922 than in 1921, but still much less than in 1914, and companies concentrated on the prolific fields of Stavropoleo-Moreni, Runcu, Baicoiu, and Chiciura.

Every branch of industry was affected by the world value of the leu. In spite of four years' experience of fluctuating currency, some companies suffered by the falling leu ; one, for instance, that needed material from abroad, and had to pay gold value for it, called up the balance of capital subscribed when the leu stood at less than half the value it had when subscribed. Programmes had to be cut down. The currency capital of companies which had already been increased during the last two years again proved inadequate ; more and more lei were needed, whilst in 1922 there did not appear to be any lei available for the oil industry or for anything else, and as much as 25 per cent. per annum was offered for first mortgages on real estate Refining.

Quantities are not yet available up to the end of the year. Until September 30, 910,095 tons of crude oil had been treated at the refineries, and after the first distillation it produced : 214,558 tons of benzine, 159,234 tons of lamp oil, 82,493 tons of gas oils, etc., 433,831 tons of residues—809,116 tons ; 19,979 losses—910,095 tons. Seventeen per cent. more crude oil was treated than during the same period of 1921, although in that year 92½ per cent. of the total crude oil production was treated, against only 90 per cent. in 1922. The 10 per cent. of the production not treated at the refineries was used as fuel in the fields and elsewhere, and this constituted a serious loss.

The pipeline to Constantza transported 550 tons daily, which was not sufficient. It was stated quite frankly at a conference of the directors of the pipeline service that there was no control of the line and no authority, that the pipeline service was entirely disorganised, and that there were no funds for urgent work and current necessities.

The following quantities were delivered for internal consumption up to the end of September (the figures representing tons) :—Benzine, 54,686 : distilled petroleum, 2,448 ; refined petroleum, 52,970 ; gas oil, etc., 86,344 ; paraffin, 983 ; residues, 301,908—499,339 ; burnt as fuel in refineries, 105,452—604,791 ; as against 473,540 tons during the same period of 1921, being an increase of 131,251 tons, or 28 per cent. The refineries in the district of Prahova (mostly in Ploesti) delivered 536,163 tons of the total of 604,791 tons.

The distribution of these products in the interior of the country was not considered satisfactory at the beginning of the year because of the usual shortage of locomotives and cisterns ; but an improvement took place later. Nevertheless, as the new Roumania has a population of 17½ millions, as against the population of 7½ millions in 1914, it is quite obvious that with the smaller production it is still only a proportion of the population that can obtain oil for their lamps.

The Export Trade.

The export to Egypt is beginning to be important again, as it was before the war. Egypt,

Turkey, and Italy are Roumania's best customers for lamp oil, whilst Germany and France increased their import of Roumanian benzine. The export to all countries, with the exception of England and of Czecho-Slovakia, increased. Of the total quantity of 315,512 tons exported (nine months), 242,303 tons were shipped from Constantza and 45,618 tons from Giurgiu.

(To be concluded.)

AGRICULTURE IN PALESTINE.

The Labour Problem.

Those who wish to obtain a clear idea of the difficulties and complexities with which the Government of Palestine is confronted in the work of developing the country should read the admirable "Review of the Agricultural Situation in Palestine," by Mr. E. R. Sawer, Director of Agriculture, which has been recently issued by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries. This report only covers the period down to the spring of last year: but while much has been done in Palestine since then, the situation is, broadly speaking, much the same, and the fact that it is not absolutely up to date detracts very little from the value of a most informative work.

When the Department of Agriculture was established in 1920, the position was that, as a result of the War, the organisation established under the Turkish régime had disappeared, and it was necessary to create anew an institution that could deal with the various requirements of agriculture.

The nature of the problem and the difficulties imposed by the question of finance can be gathered from the following extract:—

Smaller than Belgium or Wales in habitable area, without visible coal, oil, timber, or minerals of commercial value, Palestine must depend economically and fiscally upon its rural industries. For this purpose not more than two million hectares of land are available within our political boundaries as immediately defined. Of this area only half a million hectares are at present under perennial cultivation, as a result of heavy mortality among working cattle during the war and a subsequent collapse of agricultural credit. Primitive methods of farming and a very low standard of yields, coupled with a lack of crops of high intrinsic value, further limit agricultural revenue, and, with it, the proceeds of taxation, based on an ad valorem principle.

To reconcile, in such circumstances, conflicting demands for development and economy, recourse has been had to a number of temporary expedients, for which the end alone justifies the means. Such a policy was originally imposed by a reference of all capital work to a projected public loan which was to issue as soon as the status of a civil administration had been established by definite mandate. Unfortunately and unexpectedly, this restriction still obtains. . . .

Some of the handicaps of agriculturists, such as the shortage of live-stock and labour and the lack of credit, have in some measure been remedied: but until cultivators as a whole are able and willing to conduct operations on modern lines agricultural progress must of necessity be restricted. The poor yields of the crops show the position very clearly. The 1919-20 season was favourable for the winter crops, but the average yield of wheat per hectare in Palestine was only 593 kilos of grain, while in Egypt it was 1,793 kilos, and the figures for other crops were much the same.

Reasons are found in primitive methods of cultivation, weed-growth as an aftermath of war, lack of manure and chemical fertilisers, poor seed and unproductive varieties. The "nail plough" is well adapted to the rocky soils of our hillsides, but in the plains an implement is badly needed which will turn over the soil to a reasonable depth and cover a firmly-established weed growth.

In the best circumstances, however, it is pointed out that the export of a small surplus of grain could have little effect on an unsatisfactory trade balance, and efforts are consequently being directed to the introduction of crops of greater value, such as tobacco, sugar, cotton, flax, and castor. Here, of course, the labour question is all-important.

Labour immediately available for actual field operations in the limited area hitherto developed cannot, probably, exceed one adult to three hectares of land. That such a ratio precludes any considerable extension, in present conditions, of our staple cereal crops, and, equally, prohibits the general adoption of new elements such as cotton, tobacco, sugar beet, flax, or potatoes, will be self-evident. An association of experienced cotton growers has assured the Government that the only possibility of profitable cotton cultivation lies in the annual importation of Egyptian fellahin. For our labour deficiency is both quantitative and qualitative. The Palestinian cultivator is both untrained and unequipped for the production of other than the few simple crops which at present engage his attention. . . . A shortage of both human and animal labour is further accentuated by the lack of sowing, weeding, harvesting, and threshing equipment.

The question whether a good living is possible on a farm of, say, 50 hectares is the subject of interesting comment in the section of the report on "Animal Husbandry and Mixed Farming."

The experience of other countries is available to show that this can only be realised by combining the rearing and feeding of livestock with the raising of crops which at all times command a ready market. This would apparently demand a revolution in local thought, but may be brought about by a coalition and development of the two distinct and equally primitive systems of farming which at present characterise Palestinian agriculture. On the one hand we have pastoral Bedawi tribes, driving their flocks from summer to winter grazing grounds. . . . On the other hand, we have the sedentary Arab, living in agricultural villages, exhausing patch after patch of ground by continuous wheat and barley cropping. . . .

The progress report of the Orion Societate Anonima de Petrol for June shows that the crude oil production for the month was 3,445 tons and the throughput of the refinery 2,676 tons, 749 tons being converted into lubricating oils. Two wells caught fire during the month, but have been restored and bailing recommenced.

TANKER CHARTERING REVIEW.

Lower Freight Rates in Prospect.

Messrs. John I. Jacobs and Co., of London, in their half-yearly report on oil-tanker chartering, state:—

Since our last issue conditions for tank steamer owners have undergone a complete change, owing principally to the partial failure of the oil fields of Mexico and the enormous and somewhat unexpected increased production in California. These two important events in the oil world synchronised with the effect that over twice the amount of tonnage was required by the refiners on the East Coast of United States to haul the necessary amount of crude oil from California instead of from Mexico. As the result of this situation, tank steamer rates commenced to improve early in the year, and there was considerable activity on the part of the large producers and distributors. Tonnage was taken on time charter for periods varying from 6 months to 2 years.

According to Lloyd's Register, there were early in the year 49 steamers and motor vessels, each of over 1,000 tons, with a total tonnage of 300,128, under construction for the carriage of oil in bulk, as compared with a total of 62 tank vessels building at the quarter ending September 30, 1922. It was computed that early this year the total of tankers afloat was about 700, the d.w. capacity of these tankers being between 6,000,000 and 7,000,000 tons. Since then, orders for quite a number of tank steamers have been placed, principally in the United Kingdom and Germany, and in the majority of cases for boats propelled by Diesel engines. The United States Shipping Board have taken every advantage of the situation, and have disposed of the bulk of their larger tank steamers to American owners and corporations, who require them principally for their trade from California to the East Coast of U.S., between which ports only the American flag is allowed to trade. The production of crude oil in America continues to increase and generally speaking is somewhat in excess of the requirements of the American refiners. In Mexico, as mentioned above, there has been a partial failure of the fields, but this affects the lighter type of crude oil. In the case of heavy Panuco crude oil, production and exports show an increase. Great efforts are being made practically all over the world to obtain oil production, and these efforts are meeting with a measure of success in many new areas The production in Eastern Europe still lacks comparison with that prior to 1914. The demand for all oil products continues to expand and, so far as gasoline is concerned, the domestic trading of U.S. America continues to be the controlling factor. It is said that over 12,000,000 automobiles are now registered in that country, and the manufacturers predict that during the course of this year the number will be very considerably increased.

During the period under review, representative rates of freight have been as under:—

Northern States of America.—The amount of tonnage fixed for Trans-Atlantic voyages from these ports has been comparatively small, the boats of the smaller type have been preferred principally for the carriage of lubricating oils. Rates at the commencement of the year were on the basis of 20s. to 21s. 6d. and had risen to 37s. 6d., at which business was done.

Gulf of Mexico.—After getting tonnage freely at 17s. 6d. for both light oil and dark oil boats, and at 15s. 9d. for consecutive voyages, the rate rose for light oil boats to U.K. Continent to over 40s., at which several fixtures were effected, but 35s. has since been accepted. In one case a steamer secured a freight as high as 60s. for light oil to Alexandria. In this trade the larger tonnage has secured the bulk of the employment, smaller boats not being able to compete on anything like equal terms. Rates are now easier, particularly for dirty boats.

Mexico to U.S. Refineries.—The amount of tonnage taken by this trade has been on a somewhat smaller scale, owing to the partial failure of the fields. Rates early in the year were on the basis of 14 cents to 15 cents for the voyage from Tampico to the U.S. Gulf Ports and 20 cents to 25 cents from Tampico to the Northern Range. The general change in the situation and the withdrawal of American tonnage for the Californian trade created a shortage which was rapidly reflected in the rise in freight rates to 30 cents for New Orleans and 50 cents to the Northern Range, but tonnage could now be obtained at lower rates.

California.—A very large business has been done, more particularly in the carriage of crude oil by American tank steamers, to Eastern Coast of United States. 1 dollar per barrel has been paid for consecutive voyages over 12 months from San Pedro to New York, Philadelphia or Baltimore. Business from the Californian Coast to Europe has also been active, and rates rose from 30s. paid early in the year to 70s. offered. Tonnage is now obtainable at considerably easier rates.

Russia.—The volume of business from the Russian Black Sea oil ports has been somewhat smaller. It is reported from reliable quarters, however, that production will steadily increase, existing plant being renewed and new machinery installed. Charterers, after obtaining tonnage of 16s. 6d. from Batoum to U.K. Continent, had shortly afterwards to concede 37s. 6d., and in one case 50s. for lubricating, but 30s. has since been taken.

Roumania.—Business has been on an exceedingly limited scale owing to the continued enforcement of the Roumanian export regulations, which have only lately been modified, allowing increases up to 15 per cent. A handy boat was fixed on the basis of 40s. Constanza to the Continent.

Time Charter.—For reasons already mentioned tankers on this basis were at one time very freely chartered by the large producing and distributing companies, and rates rapidly rose from 4s. to 4s. 3d. on the d.w., according to type of steamer, to 6s. 6d. for steam-driven boats and 7s. 6d. for Diesel boats. These rates are for periods varying from 9 months to 24 months, the period in the majority of cases being in charterer's option. The demand for boats on time charter is now quiet, but charterers can be found to fix for a period of ten years at about 7s. on the d.w. for a Diesel boat.

Owing to the position of the Ruhr and the low level to which rates were brought, little was done in Creosote shipments early in the year. Fixtures were recorded on the basis of 10s. 6d. for 5,000 tons for three ports of loading to one port Northern States, with the improvement in homeward market these rates moved up in sympathy, but have since become easier on the basis of 14s. for 8,500 tons two ports to two ports.

One is faced with the usual difficulties in attempting to prognosticate the future, but indications are that the second half of 1923 will see freight rates on a lower level, although it seems unlikely that they will again reach the low level mark of late 1922, the lowest point for some ten years.

CONDITION OF EGYPTIAN CROPS.

Cotton Backward but Improving.

The Bulletin of the Egyptian Ministry of Agriculture gives the following particulars of crop conditions in June:—

Cotton.—The hot and favourable weather has improved the state of the plants since last month but the growth is still uneven and late in most districts. Prospects in Upper Egypt are more favourable than in Lower Egypt. The water supply was ample everywhere. Flowering was general and boll-formation is progressing in early-sown fields. The cotton worm attack was general in Lower and Middle Egypt, but, being very slight, practically no damage has been done to the crop so far. Slight attacks of wilt have been reported from some districts in Lower Egypt and Minia. Cut worm and aphis have also been reported from a few localities in Lower Egypt but have caused no serious damage. On the whole the condition of the crop has somewhat improved on that of the previous month, but, with the exception of certain districts, the crop is still backward.

Millet (sêfi).—The weather was favourable and water supply sufficient. Passing, thinning, and watering are in progress. Stalk borer has been reported in Minia and Girga.

Rice (sêfi).—Sowing and weeding are being done under favourable conditions.

Sugar-cane.—The crop is growing under favourable conditions. Local attacks of stalk borer have been reported in Beni Suef and Faiyûm.

Wheat.—Harvesting has almost been completed and the yield is above the average

Barley.—Harvesting has now been completed. The yield is slightly above the average.

Bersim.—Harvesting of bersim for seed is progressing everywhere and the yield is expected to be below the average.

Earthnuts.—The crop is growing satisfactorily. Flowering is in progress.

SUDAN PRODUCE.

The following extracts are taken from the report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government for May:—

Gum.

Fung Province, April.—219 tons of hashab and 306 tons of talh gum were exported by rail from Sennar River siding.

Upper Nile Province.—115 tons of hashab and 27 tons of talh gum were exported during the month.

Kordofan Province.—26,053 kantars of gum were sold in El Obeid market during the month, as against 15,175 kantars during the same month last year. The average price was £E.1.360 mm. per kantar. The arrivals at El Obeid from Nahud were 10,029 kantars, as against 14,334 kantars last year. The amount sold at Nahud during the month was 8,306 kantars, as against 9,311 kantars last year. The average price being £E1.140 mm. per kantar 3,425 kantars were sold at Um Ruaba at an average price of £E1.350 the kantar, as against 1,710 kantars last year.

At Rahad 778 kantars were sold at prices ranging from £E1.300 to £E1.450, as against 623 kantars last year.

Rainfall and Cultivation.

Berber Province.—Further early rains fell throughout the province in the last week of the month. Conditions appear to favour the appearance of locusts, but nothing has so far been reported in this regard.

Upper Nile Province.—Rainfall at Malakal Station has been slight, but heavy in the neighbourhood and south, and cultivation has started. Totals for the month are: Malakal 85.6 mm. Renk 45.8 mm. A cloudburst occurred at Melut on May 2, the rainfall in less than three hours exceeding 140 millimetres.

White Nile Province.—Rain fell at El Dueim on five occasions during the month. The heaviest fall on any one day was on the 17th, when 14.5 millimetres fell. The total fall for the month was 39.2 millimetres. Sowing has been taking place on the Goz lands in Dar Gima and to the west of El Dueim. The Dukhn at Um Bueisa, 10 miles west of El Dueim, was 6 inches high at end of month.

Kordofan Province.—Cultivation has been commenced in most parts of the Province, except Bara, where there was no rainfall.

Wheat and Barley.

Dongola Province.—Ghaba Pumping Station Report, April.—The harvesting of wheat is practically finished. The crop was poor, rust having caused considerable damage. The assessment averaged 2.7 ardebs of 360 rotls (162 kilos) per feddan. Gurier Pumping Station report, April.—Wheat is coming in very well, 270 ardebs having been brought in to the store at the end of April.

Halfa Province, April.—In Sukkot and Mahas District a yield of 4 ardebs per feddan was obtained from wheat and barley crops.

Dura.

Kassala Province, April and May.—275 ardebs of dura were exported from Gedaref during April, and 276 ardebs during May.

Upper Nile Province.—11 tons of dura were exported during May.

Kordofan Province.—60 ardebs of dura were sold in El Obeid market at an average price of £E1.225 per ardeb of 420 rotls (189 kilos).

Dukhn.

Fung Province, April.—59 tons of dukhn were exported by rail from Sennar River siding during the month.

Kordofan Province.—93 ardebs of dukhn were sold in El Obeid market at an average price of £E1.300 per ardeb of 420 rotls (189 kilos).

White Nile Province.—117 ardebs of 300 rotls (135 kilos) were exported from Dueim during the month. Average price 750 mm. per ardeb.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Erratic and Weak.

The Commercial Company of Egypt in their report for the week ended July 6, state :—

Since our last report the future market has been rather erratic, and closed weak. The decline in New York on the publication of the second bureau condition of the season of the American crop has very much surprised operators here, the figure of 69.9, against 71.0 a month ago and 71.2 a year ago, being considered a bullish one, and in any case within current expectations. At the first tender of July Sakellarides 71,000 kantars have been delivered, but the market took them well, in view, we presume, of the existing premium of November. Ashmounis have been slightly easier, but the existing supply is very limited, and no decline in prices to any extent is likely to occur before the new crop cotton of this growth appears on the market. The demand from abroad has not improved, and the market has thus been deprived of any trade support. Egyptian in Liverpool has been again rather weak, despite the continued heavy daily spot sales. However, the stocks are decreasing steadily, and some appreciation in the present parity with Alexandria may be expected as soon as the liquidation of the July Liverpool position is over. This week's receipts amounted to 6,388 krs., and the total since September 1 now stands at 6,619,948 krs. Exports have this week amounted to 80,403 krs., and the stock now stands at 1,239,640 krs., against 1,313,655 krs. a week ago, and 1,820,361 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—We have had a quiet week at Minet el Bassal, and sales amount to about 5,000 bales, of which we estimate 3,400 B/s Sakellarides, 1,500 B/s uppers, and 100 B/s various. Spot cotton has not followed the decline in contracts, and fully good fair spot is appreciably dearer than the fully good fair contract in all growths. With continued good exports and negligible arrivals, the stock shows a marked decrease, and the statistical position becomes stronger each week.

Sakellarides.—All styles have been dealt in, but the bulk of the business has been in fully good fair and fully good fair to good. Below fully good fair cotton is so scarce and dear that the better grades at the small existing differences have naturally attracted buyers' attention. Prices of spot against contracts are considerably dearer than last week, holders having refused to follow the decline in contracts.

Uppers.—The greater portion of the business has been in the good grades; medium and lower styles have been in comparatively poor demand, due probably to their dearness and scarcity. Prices of spot against contracts are much dearer than last week, holders refusing to follow the drop.

Brown and Pilion.—A small business has been done at hardening rates in sympathy with uppers.

White.—A retail business has been done. Spot prices against contracts are markedly dearer than last week. Crop, 1923.—News continues satisfactory. Leaf worm has appeared in varying intensity in all districts, but no serious damage is reported.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Sales of Egyptian Still Good.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended July 11 :—

The past week has been quiet and uneventful. During the first part a slight downward tendency in prices was noticeable, but latterly a better tone has developed, thanks to rather brighter news from Manchester. On the whole, the general inquiry has shown signs of falling off, but considering the time of the year, the sales of Egyptian cotton still remain extraordinarily good. No new ground has been broken, and the basis, both for Sakel and Uppers, has given way slightly. More than ever, Sakellaridis cotton would appear to be cheap, and there are signs that speculation is again being attracted in this direction. Uppers, 15¾d. to 16¼d., and Sakellaridis, "50 to 100 points on," have formed the major portion of the inquiry. Prices have proved to be rather irregular, and here and there cases of forced selling have been discernible. This is all to the advantage of the spinner, who finds the Liverpool spot market far more attractive at the present time than the c.i.f. market in Alexandria. C.i.f. business, indeed, appears to have quite gone out of fashion in the Egyptian section.

The gradual working up towards the good qualities in Sakellaridis continues, but the movement is a slow one. The opinion is gaining ground here that the values placed upon good to fine Sakellaridis in this market have been excessive, and a further slight contraction in the difference between F.G.F. and Good has taken place. Even so, there appears to be room for further modification, especially in fine cotton, the stock of which is admittedly large. Brown, white, and all Sudan growths have been neglected. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 6th instant were returned as 10,280 bales. The large stocks held in this country are at last showing signs of shrinkage, but even allowing for a continuance of the present good trade in Egyptian cotton, there should be more than enough to satisfy the needs of the Lancashire spinners. If there is to be any shortage at all this season present indications point to its being felt in the Upper market first. Crop news continues to be favourable, and a comparatively large yield is expected for 1923-24. Total sales 6,000 bales (including 10 bales Sudan). Quotations of F.G.F. Sakellaridis are reduced 15 points; those of good to ex. fine 25 points. Brown and Upper are 19 points lower on the week. F.G.F. Sakel to-day 15.75d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

No Important Changes.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended July 14 states :—

There is no material change to report with regard to the state of affairs in this market. The re-entry into activity of the British Government on the questions of Reparations and the French occupation of the Ruhr is generally welcomed as a step towards the removing of what is felt to be one of the main difficulties in the way of that revival of trade which is so badly needed.

Yarn.—The present much reduced output appears quite, if not more than, ample to meet demands, and no improvement in the position of the firms spinning the coarser counts can be recorded. The steady demand for the finer qualities continues. With regard to the former, it is generally conceded that the basic prices fixed by the Master Cotton Spinners' Federation are unobtainable. Shipments during June were 10,029,300 lb., against 12,574,500 lb. in May, and 15,743,900 lb. in June last year.

Cloth.—There has, perhaps, been a little more life in this section, but most of the inquiry continues to be at prices which cannot be accepted. A moderate trade has been done for China; India has been disappointing. There is a slightly more optimistic feeling with regard to Near Eastern markets owing to the improved political outlook at Lausanne. As is usual at this season of the year, the home trade is very quiet. Shipments of cloth last month were 300,669,100 square yards, against 409,962,600 square yards in the previous month, and 311,907,300 square yards in June last year.

Raw Cotton.—Values have changed little on the week. Business done in Liverpool continues to be on a small scale. Reports from America with regard to the growing crop have, generally speaking, been favourable, and those from Egypt very good. Closing prices are as follows :—American fully middling, 15.94; Egyptian fully good fair, 15.65.

The progress report of Phœnix Oil and Transport Company, Ltd., and allied companies (including the Roumanian Consolidated Oilfields, Ltd.) for June shows that the crude oil production for the month was 5,516 tons and the throughput of the refinery 5,050.

BRITISH EMPIRE EXHIBITION.

It is officially announced that the Prince of Wales has consented to become President of the British Empire Exhibition. His Royal Highness has hitherto been President only of the General Committee.

The report of the board of the Exhibition for the month ended June 30 states that the record of the Exhibition has been one of steady progress. There have been several gratifying evidences of the progress of enthusiasm in the Home Country, Dominions, and Colonies.

The construction of the concrete floor of the Indian pavilion has been practically finished, and a beginning has been made with the erection of the steel work for the towers. The progress on this building is generally good. Good progress has been made with the construction of the Burma pavilion. The site has been cleared and the construction of the foundations practically finished, and work begun with the construction of the flooring.

ROUMANIAN BOND SERVICE.

In the House of Commons on July 16, Brigadier-General Spears asked the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the fact that the Roumanian Government had not even yet resumed sinking fund operations and payment of interest in gold lei on Roumanian Government Four per Cent. bonds, although they were under contract with the pre-war British holders of those bonds, he would consider making strong recommendations to the Roumanian Finance Minister on the subject.

Mr. McNeill: During the Roumanian Finance Minister's visit to London representations were made to him, as I informed the hon. member on July 11, on all the various subjects affecting the economic and financial relations of Great Britain and Roumania. The specific point referred to by the hon. and gallant member has, moreover, been brought to the notice of the Roumanian Minister in London—I regret to say, so far without any result whatever.

ROUMANIA AND BRITISH CREDITORS.

In the House of Commons on July 16, Mr. Arthur Michael Samuel asked the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he was aware that the agreement signed with the Roumanian Commission for the settlement of private debts due to British commercial creditors had been varied by the Roumanian law of June 2, 1923; whether he would point out to the Roumanian Minister of Finance, who had this week arrived here, that Article 12 of the new law was regarded by British creditors as being contrary to the existing agreement to which H.E. M. N. Titulesco was a party; and would he request the Roumanian Government to give effect to the judicial decisions in favour of British subjects pronounced by the Roumanian courts of law against Roumanian commercial debtors.

Lieut.-Colonel Buckley: I have been asked to reply. The matter has been discussed with M. Bratianu, and I understand that as the result of further discussions which have taken place between representatives of British creditors and M. Bratianu, the latter has undertaken that the law in question shall be so amended as to bring it into conformity with the agreements and remove the hardships it inflicts in its present form on British creditors.

Company Meeting.

P. AND O. BANKING CORPORATION.

Third Annual Meeting.

Presiding on July 13 at the third ordinary meeting of shareholders of the P. and O. Banking Corporation, Limited, Lord Inchcape (the report and accounts having been taken as read) said he would like, in the first place, to refer to the loss the bank had sustained in the death of two of its directors, Sir Richard Vassar Smith and Sir Duncan Carmichael, both valued colleagues who had taken a deep interest in the bank's concerns. The former had been succeeded by Lord Selborne, a director of Lloyds Bank, of which Sir Richard was Chairman.

Expansion of the Bank's Business.

The total figures of the balance sheet, all items of which showed expansion, had risen from £13,000,000 to £22,500,000, a gratifying feature being the rise in current deposit and other accounts to £10,000,000 from £6,316,000 a year ago. Their cash position was very strong indeed, and nobody would cavil at the large liquid balances of nearly £5,000,000, representing about 50 per cent. of their demand liabilities, which they had thought it necessary, even at the expense of profits, to retain in these uncertain days. The meeting would be glad to note that the item "Bills discounted" had increased to over £4,500,000, and included such liquid assets as £2,630,000 in British and Indian Government Treasury Bills.

Effects of Trade Depression.

The bank's securities, save for the permanent investment in the Allahabad Bank, were all British or Indian Government securities. The decrease in advances to customers to £2,850,000 from £3,490,758 a year ago reflected the depression in trade. Money rates had been low and, having opened, in the first three years of the bank's existence, eight branches in the East, they had had to carry a load of new development which, apart from the heavy initial outlay involved, could not at once yield its quota of profit.

Valuation of Rupee Assets and Liabilities.

He had, he said, been asked by one or two of the shareholders to make some reference to the rate of 2s. which they had adopted for the valuation of their current rupee assets and liabilities. Some conventional valuation had to be adopted for the purpose of bringing to account their assets and liabilities in Eastern currencies, and it was immaterial what this conventional rate was so long as it was not applied to any assets and liabilities which were affected by exchange.

So far as rupees were concerned they adopted the 2s. rate because at the time the bank came into existence that was the official rate, and they had maintained it because it was still the official rate. But this rate was not the rate at which they had converted their profit and loss items which had been brought to account at the rate ruling at the close of their financial year. So also had the rupee securities been valued at the rate prevailing on March 31, as the auditors' report made clear. In fact, all items in the balance sheet affected by exchange had been valued at the rate current on March 31, and the funds remitted towards the purchase of their premises in Bombay had been valued at the rate at which they were remitted, which was below 1s. 4d.

Their paramount investment in the Allahabad Bank stood at the purchase price, and this had been remitted to India at about 1s. 5d. per rupee. Despite financial trouble in India the Allahabad Bank had held its own, and both as to staff and the advantage of having an affiliated bank with branches all over India, the P. and O. Bank had proved it a valuable connection, the value of which was likely to increase.

Dividend Maintained.

The profit on the year's working, £139,388, added to £14,042 brought forward, gave £153,430, from which they proposed to pay the same dividend as last year, 5½ per cent. less tax, but as by reason of Colonial relief the effective rate for tax deduction was reduced to 4s. 1½d., this would cost £14,000 more than last year, leaving them in a position to place £25,000 to reserve (bringing that fund up to £115,000), and to carry forward £15,179.

New Premises and the Staff.

The near completion of their new premises in London, already partly occupied, would provide comfortable housing for their managers and staff, and ample accommodation for the public. At their various branches abroad they had secured efficient managers and a good staff. They would, he was sure, join him in acknowledging that the results now reported reflected credit on the managers and staff at home and abroad.

The board's policy was one of prudence. They intended to go cautiously, avoiding risks as far as possible, gradually working up what they hoped would be a sound and lucrative business, and building up reserves, a course which he felt would have the support of their shareholders.

India and Europe.

The Continent of Europe, his lordship continued, was, before the war, India's best customer, and until things were settled there—as they hoped, by the influence of the Prime Minister and His Majesty's Government, they might soon be—the trade of India, of this country, and of the world generally would not revive.

In his humble judgment this country would gain far more by a settled Europe than by anything in the way of reparations she was likely to get from Germany.

The Government of India.

He had spent some months in India recently, and came away with no misgivings as to that country's position. Very considerable economies had been or were in course of being effected in the expenditure, and the Budget for the current year would balance, which had not been the case for the previous five years. The credit of India had been restored, and he was not without hope that, barring some failure of the monsoon, the days of deficits were past. Lord Reading, the Viceroy, with the aid of Lord Rawlinson, the Commander-in-Chief, was ruling India with a firm hand; steps had been taken which, so far as one could see, would secure the country from any serious attack by frontier tribes, and at the same time would admit of material reduction in military expenditure.

There were laudable aspirations on the part of the educated classes in India for a greater share in the Government of the country, and though these might be met in the course of time, he felt perfectly certain that nothing would ever be allowed to interfere with the supremacy of the British Raj. in India. He had, he concluded, no fear as to the future of Britain's great Dependency.

Mr. A. K. Wright, C.B.E., D.L., seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

The Dividend.

The Chairman.—I beg to propose: "That a dividend of 5½ per cent. per annum, less income-tax at 4s. 1½d., on 259,416 shares be and the same is hereby declared payable on July 20, 1923, to the members who were on the London and Bombay registers of the Corporation, respectively, on July 6, 1923."

The Right Hon. the Earl of Selborne, K.G., G.C.M.G., seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

The Chairman.—I beg to propose: "That the retiring directors—namely, Francis Alexander Johnston, Esq., James Mackenzie, Esq., the Right Hon. the Earl of Selborne, K.G., G.C.M.G., M. M. S. Gubbay, Esq., C.S.I., C.I.E., be and the same are hereby re-elected directors of the Corporation."

Sir Montagu C. Turner seconded the motion, and it was unanimously adopted.

Mr. F Ritchie.—I beg to propose: "That Messrs. W. B. Peat and Co. be re-elected auditors of the Corporation, to hold office until the next annual general meeting, and that they be paid an annual fee of £300 for the audit of the Corporation's accounts."

Mr. F. White seconded the resolution, and it was carried.

Vote of Thanks.

Mr. Norman McLeod.—Gentlemen: It is my very pleasant duty to propose a vote of thanks to our chairman. The virtues of Lord Inchcape are so well known and world-wide that it is quite unnecessary for me to reiterate though I fully endorse them. It is quite possible that some shareholders may have expected substantial progress in the bank, but we who have any connection with India know how difficult the time under review has been and are satisfied to look with confidence to the future. We have known Lord Inchcape for a long time in his successful career, and we have no doubt that under his guidance the P. and O. Bank will be equally successful and flourish. I have, therefore, to ask that you will accord him a hearty vote of thanks. (Cheers.)

Mr. J. H. James, in seconding the motion, expressed appreciation of the courtesy which he had invariably experienced at the hands of all the members of the staff.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

The Chairman.—I am very much obliged to you for the kind way in which you have spoken of myself, and I take it that in proposing a vote of thanks to me you also include my colleagues. In regard to our staff I am extremely gratified to hear that you find every courtesy extended to you, and you may be sure that it is the wish of the directors all through that that should prevail.

The proceedings then terminated.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Lausanne and After.

A Treaty of Peace may be signed at Lausanne and agreement may be reached on the future of Turkey, but there can be no final settlement of the Near Eastern question until the more serious causes of friction in the Balkans have been removed. The Lausanne Conference has left Bulgaria without access to the Ægean Sea, and has made no attempt to deal with the problem of Macedonia. As things are, no one would now ask the Conference to prolong still further its unduly protracted labours to settle these matters; but there is no reason why they should not engage immediately the attention of the countries directly concerned. Only in a spirit of give and take will a solution ultimately be found. Political conditions in the Balkans, however, generally require that each Government, for the sake of its own position at home, should insist upon doing all the taking and none of the giving. To circumvent this difficulty, we would urge upon the Governments of Yugoslavia, Greece, and Bulgaria to appoint delegates, preferably not members of the party in power, to meet, together with representatives of Roumania and the Macedonian movement, in conference, for the purpose of exploring the ground for a general settlement of all outstanding questions. The decisions of the conference would bind no country and would commit no Government: but it would be a notable step towards an ultimate settlement if fair-minded men from each country could discuss amicably the questions at issue with a view to discovering whether the sacrifices required to achieve agreement are not likely to prove in the long run lighter than the sacrifices entailed by perpetuating disagreement.

Egypt and the Hejaz.

The Hejaz version of the dispute with Egypt over the Mecca pilgrimage suggests that the Egyptian Government has acted hastily in the matter, and it remains to be seen whether the latter can remove this impression. King Hussein declares that on receipt of a telegram sent by his representatives in London, at the request of the Foreign Office, he dispatched his Prime Minister and the Chief Justice from Mecca to Jeddah to consult with the Egyptian official in charge of the Egyptian pilgrims. These Ministers informed the Emir el Haj that King Hussein was quite willing to receive both him and the Egyptian Medical Mission, and that he had a free hand to import all the medicines and hospital equipment required and to make full use of the hospitals both at Mecca and at Jeddah. It was only when the Emir el Haj insisted that he had to establish hospitals at Jeddah and Mecca, and would issue orders to the Hejaz officials, that the Shereefian Government announced that it could not brook such an infraction of its sovereign rights. Thereupon the Emir broke off negotiations and left for Egypt. Unless the Egyptian Government can controvert this version, the incident points to crude handling on both sides, as it may be presumed that some trouble had occurred before the British Government recommended King Hussein to adopt a more conciliatory attitude.

The Pitfalls of Independence.

It will not be very wide of the mark to infer that there is more behind the quarrel between Egypt and the Hejaz than the size or the claims of the medical mission escorting the Holy Carpet. With their newly acquired independence, the two countries have failed to appreciate the value of the doctrine "Live and let live." The Egyptians are criticised in the Hejaz for their exaggerated passion for a Constitution. "They have the Koran and God's laws, and need nothing more," writes the official organ in Mecca. Constitutions, it is evident, are not going to be encouraged in the Hejaz, and the danger of having the suspect thing so close to the country is recognised. The Egyptians on their part are inclined to interfere, at least verbally, in the relations between King Hussein and other Arab States. Whether the motive be anxiety lest Great Britain secures in Arabia the position that Egypt would like to earmark for herself, or whether the motive be a worthier one, there would seem little cause for the two neighbours to fall foul of one another at this stage.

Education in Cyprus.

As will be seen from a telegram that reaches us from the Greek Press Bureau in Cyprus, a pother is being raised in that island over a new Education Bill that has recently been passed by the Legislative Assembly, giving greater powers to the Government with the object of raising the standard of teaching. The system in vogue hitherto represents a gradual expansion of the conditions existing when the British took over the island in 1878. The onus of maintaining and managing its school has been left to the village, which appoints the teacher, and it is only when the Village Committee fails to do its duty, or when disputes arise, that the higher authorities intervene. As may be imagined, this system, with its uncertainty of tenure for teachers, coupled with a low scale of salaries and the absence of a pensions scheme, has handicapped education in Cyprus. Already in 1913 the Government proposed to remodel the educational system, but the outbreak of the War prevented any action being taken. The purpose of the new legislation, it is understood, is to improve the status of teachers by means of Government grants, making, as a natural consequence, their posts no longer subject solely to the whim of the Village Committee. From the fact that the Metropolitans are associated with the agitation against the new measure it may be inferred that the movement is entirely political, as these prelates are closely identified with the opposition to the present régime. There is, of course, no question of encroachment upon the religious liberties of the people; religious teaching in the schools conforms with an established curriculum, and teachers in the Christian elementary schools are required to be members of the Orthodox Church. The British Government has offered to listen to any representations on the subject, but the Cypriot delegate charged with this important mission has so far not journeyed farther than Paris.

Britain and Afghanistan.

At a meeting of the East India Association last week Sir Alfred Hamilton Grant, formerly Chief Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province, stressed the necessity for the cultivation and maintenance of the friendliest relations with the Ameer of Afghanistan. The menace of an invasion of India by Russian armies was for the present outside the range of practical politics; but the Bolshevists had realised the useful part that Afghanistan could play as a centre for the transmission of their propaganda in India. All that Great Britain and India required of the Ameer was that he should not allow his country to become a focus of intrigue against us, and that he should co-operate with us for the maintenance of peace on the common border. The Ameer, on his part, required assistance in money and munitions for the internal and external safeguarding of his realm, and, above all, honourable recognition and treatment. One of the mistakes made in the past had been the treating of Afghanistan as a petty little State, "to be browbeaten and ordered about at our pleasure, without allowing for the sensitiveness of the Afghan, and without recognising the valuable cards that the Ameer held against us."

Facilities for Afghan Students.

The tendency on the part of Afghanistan to draw for its material development from as wide a sphere as possible may be the inevitable tendency of its sudden emancipation from Indian leading-strings. Great Britain is not likely to become an advocate of the closed door policy in regard to the Afghans; but it may do well to take careful note of the extent to which Germany is filling the rôle of mentor and instructor to the new régime at Kabul. British industry is fully capable of looking after its own interests, and will no doubt pay attention to the potentialities of the Afghan market. Where we should like to see the British Government lend a helping hand is in the encouragement of the student class of Afghanistan to complete their studies in Great Britain. The depreciated currencies of France and Germany are such a great asset to those countries in attracting foreign students that a definite effort on the part of the British Government is required if we are not to see the youth of the countries in which the Empire has a special interest drawn away to French and German educational institutions. Some time ago we drew attention to the number of Afghans studying in France: there would seem to be even more in Germany. Apart from the fact that the sympathies of these returned students are likely to be always with the country where they were educated, they must directly or indirectly influence the Afghans in the choice of markets from which they will obtain their goods in the future.

The New Order.

It may seem strange that Sir Alfred Hamilton Grant should consider his warning necessary in a year when the Royal Asiatic Society celebrates its centenary, and when such bodies as the Central Asian Society and the East India Association exist for the spread of a better understanding of the peoples of Asia. Too much insistence, however, cannot be placed on the fact that a new orientation is called for in the whole of our Eastern policy, as no race in the world has remained outside the reach of the new spirit actuating the nations since the Great War. It is perhaps fortunate for Great Britain that this spirit of independence and the bacillus of self-help have permeated the whole world at once. Their presence has helped us not a little to divest ourselves of lingering ideas of incongruity attaching to the Nationalist movement in such countries as India and Egypt. With both Afghanistan and Turkey assured of complete independence, it is conceivable that Moslem States will now begin to institute comparisons among themselves instead of thinking only of Islam as pitted against Christianity. Already the constitutional theories that have found favour in Egypt and Turkey are obtaining a wider vogue; the Hejaz is being reminded that its medical knowledge is not up to standard, and it is certain that, if Irak makes more of its own resources now than it did under the Ottoman régime, Turkey will hear of it. All this makes for progress; it is to be hoped that it will also make for peace.

Indian Expenditure in England.

Last week's debate on the East India Loans Bill was marked by the intervention of two ex-Ministers in favour of a proposal to require that the bulk of the money borrowed by India should be spent in this country. One does not now look to Mr. Lloyd George for guidance on economic questions, but Mr. Austen Chamberlain speaks with authority, and his argument for protecting British workmen calls for some notice. The scientific economist will, of course, brush it aside on the ground that a foreign loan necessarily involves the export of its equivalent in goods or services, and consequently any formal limitation in its terms would be a waste of ink or would at most favour some British producers at the cost of others. The plain man objects that, in the present state of Indian feeling, any proposal of the kind is sure to be regarded as a revival of the obsolete idea of exploiting a helpless dependency, and will thus serve as fresh fuel to a dying fire. Both classes of critics may find common ground in the fact that, without any such limitation, nineteen-twentieths of recent Indian loans have been spent directly on British goods, and the House evidently thought that this was sufficient, for the proposal was rejected without a division.

The Indian Services Commission.

The announcement issued early this month that the Indian Services Commission would not assemble until November was accepted in this country with more or less resignation as an admission that Viscount Peel's hopes of hustle had been disappointed. The mail papers now to hand show that in the last week of June Indian members of the Commission were still protesting against the instructions to sail for England without delay, so it is, perhaps, allowable to infer that the idea of an immediate meeting was abandoned in deference to them, and not at the instance of the English members; but, whoever is to blame, the result is greatly to be regretted. The outstanding issues are few and comparatively simple, but they will get more and more treacherous as the months roll on. The Commission will meet for the first time about ten months after the decision to appoint it was reached, and will, perhaps, examine its first witness on what should have been the date of submission of its first report. Meanwhile open sores will have festered through another hot weather, and it is safe to conclude that the task of the members will have grown in difficulty, as well as volume.

The Royal Asiatic Society.

The Royal Asiatic Society has successfully accomplished the celebration of its centenary in accordance with the programme which we gave last week, and the question of its future activities is now more interesting than any retrospect of its past. Whatever was the position in 1823, it is obviously impossible that any committee, however gifted, should exercise effective control or guidance over the huge mass of Asiatic scholarship which has grown up in the last hundred years, and it looks rather as if the society might by and by find itself sidetracked by the advent of independent competitors, more limited in range and more ardent in attack. We trust that the men who direct it will bear in mind the true significance of its badge, the banyan tree, and its motto, Quot rami tot arbores. The only prospect, indeed, of maintaining its position is that it should function actively as the foster-mother of localised and specialised societies. Its first century appears to have produced only four branches altogether; is it going too far to suggest that it might now advantageously set about the establishment of subsidiary organisations in every university town in Asia?

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

The Work of Parliament.

It is the commonest of jibes to say that no private firm could run its business as the State conducts its affairs; but not until this year has there been any serious appreciation by members of Parliament of the fact. Now, however, some attempt is to be made to arrange the sessions on business lines. This is how matters are done at the moment: Parliament meets in February; it has before March 31 to do an enormous amount of work on the Address, supplementary estimates, the chief Army, Navy, and Air Force votes, and so on, and cannot really indulge its love of legislation until April. That means that between this time and early August—the end of the session—Bills are crowded on top of each other, late sittings are the rule, and, generally, everything and everybody is in a state of congestion. But an endeavour is now being made (there was another in 1914) to get Parliament to adapt its session to the seasons of the year. A Joint Committee of both Houses is to consider a proposal that Parliament should begin its year in November, should get through the preliminary work before Christmas, and then, at the beginning of a new year, start with its legislation. All this seems very sensible; particularly, it would decrease the amount of work that has to be done in the very hot weather.

Athletics at Wembley.

There were not many who prophesied an English win in the athletic contest which took place on Saturday at the Wembley Stadium between the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge and Harvard and Yale; but the fearful ones were joyfully astonished to find our men winning by 6½ events to 5½. It was a very fine encounter, carried out in admirable spirit. The time is happily over when complaints could be lodged against American methods on the track, and these Harvard and Yale representatives seem to have been most excellent fellows. H. M. Abrahams, the Cambridge President, it was who settled the issue in our favour; he won the hundred, the 220, and the long jump—a remarkable athlete! People are already wondering what Cambridge will do next year without him.

The Prince in Wessex.

The visit of the Prince of Wales to Wessex has aroused keen interest, not only because whatever the Prince does is interesting, or because Wessex is commonly reputed to be the loyallest part of England, but also because he was entertained there by the re-creator of Wessex, Thomas Hardy. It was a beautiful geste this, finely conceived and executed. Here is England's first living poet, shunning and indeed loathing all advertisement, living his lonely life near Dorchester in what happiness is possible to a man of his temperament; and to him comes, simply and without the least parade or affectation, our first Prince. The lunching of the Prince with the poet struck the general imagination; and people are curious to know the details of their conversation over the table. But this, we may be sure, they will never know. Mr. Hardy has too fine a pride and reserve to publish things like this, and though the Prince's visit brought very genuine joy to the heart of this saddened philosopher, it is certain that he will not communicate to us any change in his view of life. There never was, however it may have been developed, a more inexorable or inevitable philosophy than Mr. Hardy's.

Women at Cambridge.

If there is one thing more than another in which Labour members and Feminist Liberals may be distrusted it is in the question of education. It was only by a narrow issue that they did not the other day in the House force upon the University of Cambridge the admission of women to full membership of the University. Of course, one hears it said on every foolish side that the membership of women is only a question of time, that Cambridge cannot stick out indefinitely as a cape of reaction, and so on, but, at any rate, while there is life there is hope. This, however, is not the immediate question, which is the wider one of whether or not, owing to the State subsidy, the University shall continue to have autonomy. The Senate's decision on the question of women is, of course, known to every member of the House of Commons, but, regardless of that, many of them are prepared to bind their own ignorant views upon the governing body of the University. If Cambridge cannot enjoy liberty of action, it will cease to exist; and though to Labour members this may not matter much, there are still a few people who think that would be a pity.

The Singapore Base.

It looks rather as if the Admiralty wished to get their plans for the construction of a naval base at

Digitized by Google

Singapore ratified before the meeting of the Imperial Conference in October. Why they should be in such a hurry is not known, and while we do not doubt that their reason is adequate, it is hard to see why it is uncommunicable. As far as one can judge, they have public opinion with them, because this country, while paying theoretical reverence to the fetish of "economy," is by no means prepared to take any chances over the Navy. No one is seriously troubled by the absence of an answer to the question: Who is going to attack us? All we know is that, in spite of friendly policies and intentions, enemies have a habit of arising from somewhere. Quite obviously this plan is one of defence, not of aggression, and it is recognised as such by foreign observers. Certainly it has its critics, but on main grounds it is approved both at home and in the colonies.

Our Labour Party.

Mr. Ramsay MacDonald has hit upon a most ingenious method of political criticism, which he employs apparently only in front of his own followers. He simply says that every bad thing that has happened has come from the present Government, and that every good thing has come from the Labour Party. There are no brains in our poor Government, it seems, for every wise thing it has done, whether in finance, in foreign policy, or in industrial affairs, has been copied from the Labour Party. It is so easy to be wise after the event, and to say, when matters have turned out well, that that is exactly what you would have done. But this is not the only thing the Labour Party can do; it also knows how to avert war. Unfortunately, it is, according to Mr. MacDonald, the only party which does know how to avert war, and since it is not in power at the moment, that is rather hard luck for us. As a matter of fact, this sort of nonsense does not deceive the English working man, who remembers that there are certain Labour members whose method of averting war is mere refraining from fighting.

The Union of the Churches.

The ecclesiastically-minded are now indulging in a riot of conferences. First came the Anglo-Catholics, the success of whose meetings exceeded all expectations and worked Mr. John Kensit to his traditional frenzy; and now we have the Wesleyan Conference, graced by the presence of no less a divine than the Archbishop of Canterbury. That the men who, at the Lambeth Conference, saw in the reunion of the Churches a hope of salvation were in earnest was made manifest from his words. In pleading for re-union he said that the right way was to take the simplest presentation of the truth of the Gospel. Of all ways this is undoubtedly the likeliest; it is the way which appeals particularly to Englishmen; but one can hardly say that the Anglo-Catholics are wrong when they point out that this very way has been tried and has failed. Once more is the conviction forced home upon one that it is not the divisions between churchmen that so much matter; it is rather the growing mass of people outside all doctrine which causes anxiety. And whether Wesleyanism or moderate Anglicanism or a compromise between them can ever have again sufficient fire to kindle souls is at least open to doubt. For the conversion of indifferent minds one should probably look to the extremer forms of faith in this country.

The Hospitals.

One has always admired the medical profession of all others, for in no class of men is the idea of service more deeply planted than in doctors. Perhaps they lost a little caste over their acceptance of Mr. Lloyd George's notorious Insurance Act, but by most people their perplexed conduct at that time has been forgotten. In their recent conference at Portsmouth they showed their finest qualities. For when the proposal that part of the moneys contributed by patients to hospitals should go to form a fund for the partial remuneration of honorary medical staffs, they promptly rejected it. The parliament of the doctors decided, in fact, that the voluntary system for the hospitals is much the best way—that, in short, the hospitals, of which we have heard so much lately, must go on begging from the public and the profession. This decision was entirely admirable, and was provoked just as much by the love of service as by the more prosaic view that if medical service in the hospitals were not free, the appeals that they have periodically to launch would be less generously answered. That our hospitals should cease to exist is incredible; but the issue is now more clearly than ever seen to rest upon the public.

The Holiday Spirit.

Surely and very perceptibly the holiday spirit is possessing London. People will talk about where they are going instead of working; travellers say it is hopeless to call on anybody, because they are away, or just going away; and, generally speaking, all eyes are turned from the metropolis to the sea. Everyone says that they hate crowds, and yet already at the big termini can be seen families perspiringly jostling one another in the greatest good will and confusion. Somebody, of course, must stop behind to do the work, but one never seems to come across these people, and the quality of the work done in London during August cannot be very high. "Of course, it's all for the children's sake," say the stern, business-loving fathers, but nobody believes them at all. It is a dreadful worry, the fixing up of a holiday, but, on the whole, well worth the trouble.

Alter Ego.

The Postmaster-General announces that the date of despatch of the air mail from Baghdad had been advanced. The mail will now normally reach London every alternate Monday, so that replies can be forwarded by the outgoing air mail despatched from London on the following Thursday. The arrangement came into force on July 12, and the mail despatched from Baghdad on that date reached London on July 23. The next air mail to Baghdad will be despatched from London to-day.

The Mahmal (Holy Carpet) has been brought back from Jeddah and landed at Suez.

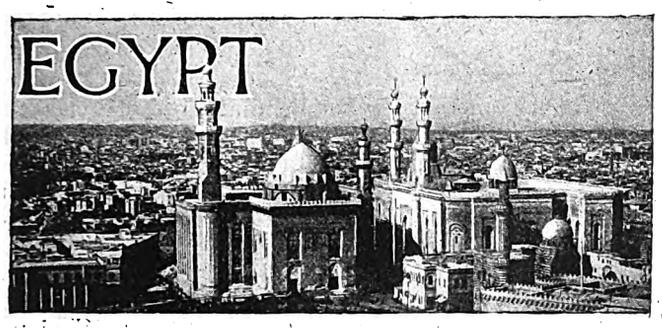
From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, July 7.

The End of Martial Law.

The long-looked-for day has come at last, and Egypt is freed from British martial law. On Thursday the country entered upon its full constitutional freedom, governed by its own laws. As I have indicated in previous letters, it has been expected for weeks past that the Indemnity Act would be promulgated and martial law abolished at the end of June or the beginning of July. The Act is a very brief document, with but two main clauses, and confined, so far as its intention goes, to preventing legal proceedings being taken against bodies and persons who have used powers conferred upon them under martial law. The Proclamation which puts an end to the régime of martial law is equally brief, being confined to its main purpose and the subsidiary end of empowering the Public Custodian to continue his administration of enemy property in Egypt.

The correspondence between the High Commissioner and the Egyptian Government, which is annexed to the foregoing two documents, is, perhaps, of more interest than the Proclamation and the Act themselves. The very vexed question of the ownership and future disposal of the lands, such as the Royal Air Force Base at Aboukir, taken over by the British military authorities since the declaration of martial law on November 2, 1914, is settled in what is, perhaps, in the circumstances, the only possible manner. The Egyptian Government undertakes to respect the status quo, thereby confirming the taking over of these lands, while the two Governments agree to defer final settlement of the question until the ultimate negotiations between Egypt and Great Britain are embarked upon. That it will then be easy to reach a solution satisfactory to both parties seems at present most improbable. This question of the lands occupied by the British authorities under martial law is one to which the Arabic newspapers have devoted much space in persistent attempts to rouse public feeling. The argument used is that it constitutes a trespass on Egypt's sovereignty for any part of Egyptian territory to be in the ownership of another Power. It will undoubtedly be very difficult ever to convince any Egyptian Government or any set of Egyptian negotiators of the acceptability of the British standpoint in this matter of the occupied lands. Prince Omar Pasha Toussoun, who was never a willing party to the occupation of his Aboukir lands, and to whom some very rash promises, that trees should not be felled and that the lands should be returned after the conclusion of peace, were made during the War, has seized the opportunity of the abolition of martial law to address a letter to the Egyptian Government and the High Commissioner, reminding them of the promises given, and stating that unless his property is returned, he will take action in the Courts against the Egyptian Government. His is a typical attitude. Undoubtedly there will be rocks ahead when this question is reached in the negotiations which are to settle finally all outstanding questions between the two Governments.

A Satisfactory Compromise.

On the other hand, it is obvious that no Egyptian Government could at this stage have made further concessions on this point. To have settled the question out of hand, before the elected representatives of the people have an opportunity of discussing it, would have been impossible.

The only remaining features of the correspondence that call for comment are the setting up of a committee composed of British and Egyptian judges, with the Judicial Adviser as President, to advise the Egyptian Government regarding the release of persons sentenced by military courts—of whom 250 are being released at once—and a reservation providing for the continuance of the Conspiracy Trial, which has been proceeding since April 5 last, and for the enforcement of its finding and sentences.

Arabic Press Comment.

The reception by the native Press of the Indemnity Act and its accompanying agreements can only be described as rather disappointing. It might have been hoped that the vernacular newspapers, though they for ever "hear a voice in every wind and snatch a fearful joy" in discerning everywhere the cloven hoof of British Imperialism, would at last recognise this real and tangible proof of Great Britain's good intentions towards Egypt. For the most part, however, comment has ignored the real and vitally important aspect of Great Britain's action, and has devoted itself to captious criticism of details and of the wording of the correspondence.

Troubles of the Wafd.

The Wafd has not yet expressed any opinion on the subject, but is reported to be preparing to unburden itself of another manifesto, characteristically deploring the "new shackles" laid upon Egypt. Indeed, there would be something lacking did not the Wafd produce its normal howl of protest. Each successive step forward during recent months has resulted in a manifesto from these obstructionists, who want no independence and no concessions not of their own obtaining. It seems that matters are going far from well with the Wafd these days. So long as Zaghloul Pasha was in exile, and there was a steady flow of Wafd members into prisons and internment camps, all was well. Such undeniable proofs of patriotism as the presence of their leaders in gaol gave the Zaghloulists a great advantage over their opponents of the Constitutional Liberal Party, whose members did not consider it necessary to get arrested in order to prove their love of the Fatherland. But now that even their noisiest agitators are free to do and say what they like, the Wafd has lost one of its strongest arguments. Besides, they suffer from a terrible embarras de richesses in the matter of leaders. The four successive executive committees are all at large, and their members, having enjoyed the limelight, are finding it hard to have to return to back seats. Difficulties are also being experienced in the provincial constituencies. The active Wafd supporters have been for the most part lawyers and doctors, residents of the big towns; but much valuable support has been received from wealthy provincial landowners. Now that the list of candidates is being drawn up, the men who have borne the heat and burden of the fight demand that comfortable provincial constituencies be found for them. But here they tread on the toes of the landed gentry, who wish that they themselves or their sons should represent their own districts. The sending down by the Wafd executive of carpet-bag lawyer candidates is resented. This is one particular cause of friction. Another more general source of trouble consists in the heterogeneous nature of the Zaghloulist Party. A considerable number of honest, self-sacrificing patriots, such as the leader himself and some of his lieutenants, is mixed with the vast mass of time-servers, office-seekers, political turn-coats, and men with no political principles beyond seeking their own advantage. In such a mongrel crowd fissiparous tendencies are inevitably manifesting themselves. Should a Zaghloulist Government take office, its plight will be appalling. For every Ministerial portfolio there will be ten candidates, for every Under-Secretaryship a hundred, while a thousand aspirants to every Director-Generalship will each consider their claims to appointment immensely greater than those of their rivals. It remains to be seen whether Zaghloul Pasha will return to Egypt to restore unity to his followers, already quarrelling, in anticipation, over a division of the spoils of victory at the polls.

A British Moslem's Visit.

It is seldom that an Englishman enjoys in Egypt such a reception as has been accorded to Lord Headley, the leading British Moslem, who is now in this country, en route for Mecca, whither he is going to perform the pilgrimage. Religious dignitaries at Port Said, where he landed from the s.s. Macedonia on Wednesday, Cairo, and Alexandria have vied with each other to do him honour. At a big reception yesterday afternoon, at the Khoronfish residence of El Sayed el Bakry, Lord Headley made a speech, contrasting the teachings of Islam with those of Christianity.

The Aly Bey Fahmy Tragedy.

The tragic death of Aly Bey Fahmy has cast a gloom over Cairo more general than I can remember in connection with the death of anybody else in recent years. Aly Bey was so well known to everybody in Egypt; he was so young and so full of joie de vivre, and his end, coming in this sudden and violent fashion, has been a great shock, even to those who knew him only by sight and reputation. The son of the late Aly Pasha Fahmy, Aly Bey inherited huge estates which brought him in an income of £E50,000 or £E60,000—sometimes as much as £E120,000—annually. Everything that Aly Bey did was done magnificently. His seven or eight motor-cars included two Rolls-Royces and two Mercedes. His 400 h.p. Sunbeam engined motor-boat was the fastest and finest craft of its class on the Nile; he had a box at the opera every night of the week; his new villa on the river bank is said to have cost him £E120,000; and so on with everything else. He went everywhere and did everything, and must have been known by sight to more people than anybody else in Cairo.

The Pilgrimage Dispute.

A very curious dispute has arisen between the Egyptian and Hejaz Governments regarding the medical contingent sent each year with the Mahmal to the Hejaz to meet the needs of pilgrims from this country. This year, in consequence of the prevalence of plague in the Near and Middle East, the Egyptian Government slightly increased the strength of the contingent, notifying the Hejaz Government of the fact. The increase is in itself of no importance, as there is no fixed number of doctors to be sent each year, and, since the medical men are themselves pilgrims, and only incidentally with the pilgrimage to render any medical assistance that may be needed, there would appear to be no reasonable grounds for objection if the Egyptian Government sent a hundred of them. But this year, for some reason or other not yet discovered, King Hussein has taken exception to the medical mission's accompanying the Egyptian pilgrims on the ground that the Hejaz is an independent State, possessed of its own adequate medical service, and that the coming of the Egyptian doctors constitutes a slight to the Hejaz Government's own arrangements for the care of the pilgrims, and also an affront to the sovereignty of the Hejaz.

This is the first time that any such objection has been raised, although the Egyptian Government has been in the custom of sending its own medical men, to care for its own nationals, since time immemorial. A military escort also accompanies the Mahmal, but to this no objection has been taken by King Hussein, although it would appear to be far more capable of being considered as an encroachment on a country's independence to send within its territories an organised body of troops than to send a few doctors.

King Hussein.

Several explanations have been put forward to account for King Hussein's action. There is a story of an Egyptian doctor who was serving with Egyptian troops in the Hejaz in 1917, and who remained in the country, gaining the confidence of the King and being appointed to an important post in the Hejaz medical service. He, it is suggested by the Egyptian Press, does not care to have his methods viewed by other Egyptian doctors, and so has prevailed upon King Hussein to refuse to allow them into the country. Then again, King Hussein has recently been most bitterly attacked by the local Arabic Press, and it is thought that this criticism may have helped to induce his present obstructive attitude where Egypt is concerned. But those who have had experience of King Hussein in the past say that he is a remarkably stubborn old man, from whose mind an idea, once fixed there, cannot be dislodged. Previously he has done the most unaccountable things, and it has been most difficult to convince him of the wisdom of modifying his attitude. In the present case he seems determined not to give way, and, as the Egyptian Government is equally decided not to yield, a rupture of diplomatic relations between the two Governments is by no means impossible. A meeting of the Council of Ministers to discuss the matter was held at Alexandria this morning, the Grand Mufti and the Rector of Al Azhar being present. Asked their opinion regarding the Government's intention to order the Emir el Haj to return with the Mahmal, its escort, the medical personnel, and the sum of £E8,000, which is the amount of the annual subsidy paid by the Egyptian Government to the Hejaz Government in respect of the pilgrimage, the two religious leaders concurred in the proposed course of action. In addition to the loss of the subsidy, the Hejaz would forfeit the shipment of wheat which is annually sent from Egypt for distribution among the pilgrims gathered at Mecca. There would also be the loss of the money normally spent by the pilgrims while in Arabia, for a large number of those from Egypt would rather return from Jeddah than complete the pilgrimage without the Mahmal and its escort. As the total number of pilgrims proceeding to Mecca this year is not much over 10,000, of whom more than 5,000 are from Egypt, the Hejaz would feel the withdrawal somewhat severely.

It is probable that the rupture of diplomatic relations would follow the order for the return of the Mahmal. This would not amount to very much, for Egypt has no representative in the Hejaz, while King Hussein's envoy in Cairo, el Sayad Abdel Malek el Khateeb, is not recognised by the Egyptian Government. He would, however, almost certainly be requested to leave the country.

Egypt's Diplomatic Service.

Once again the local Press is busy speculating on the appointment of diplomatic representatives of Egypt abroad. Every day new names are suggested. At the moment the newspaper favourites are, for London, Prince Djemil Toussoun, brother of Prince Omar Toussoun, or Aziz Pasha Ezzet; for Paris, Mahmoud Pasha Fakhry, son-in-law of King Fuad; and, for Rome, Mohammed Pasha Moheb, at present Minister of Finance. The nomination of a Minister at Washington is, according to the newspapers, giving the Government food for much thought, it being more difficult to find an Egyptian with the qualities likely to make for success in an envoy to the United States than as representative at Paris or Italy. Among the candidates for a First Secretaryship in London or Washington is Dr. Ibrahim Rashad, a young Egyptian of remarkable attainments, holding the M.A. of Cambridge University, the B.Sc. of Bristol University, the Ph.D. of the University of Ireland, and the diplomas of the agricultural colleges of Wye and Cirencester, besides having done five years at St. Thomas's Hospital, and only missing his final examination because, when the Balkan War broke out in 1912, he abandoned his medical studies and joined the British Red Cross contingent to Turkey. Dr. Rashad is at present Professor of Rural Economy at the Higher School of Agriculture.

IRAK.

Baghdad, July 12.

Tranquillity.

The country remains quiet, and the excitement occasioned by the Government's strong action against the Shiah ulema has now subsided. The Shiah tribes have taken no notice of the affair, and it seems probable that the incident, while adding considerable prestige to the Cabinet, which was strong enough to take such action, will have none of the evil results on the security of the country which pessimists were inclined to predict.

Irak and Palestine.

An arrangement has been made between the Governments of Irak and Palestine whereby documents signed before notaries in Irak and confirmed by the Ministry of Justice will be accepted in the Palestine Courts, while documents signed before notaries in Palestine and confirmed by the Registrar-General to the Palestine Government will be accepted by the Courts in Irak.

Municipal Activity.

There are unmistakable signs of municipal activity among the larger municipalities in the country. Baghdad municipality has called for tenders for the completion of the city's water supply, and Mosul municipality has asked for tenders for the supply of electric light and power. At the same time a serious attempt is being made to improve the roads in Baghdad.

ALBANIA.

Tirana, June 27.

Parliament.

Although the third Parliamentary session should, in accordance with the Constitution, have ended on May 30, it was prolonged owing to the necessity of approving the 1923 Budget. The Budget debates lasted until June 16, and on the following day the balanced Budget was voted, with some slight modifications made by different Parliamentary committees.

In this session Parliament determined the period of its existence. According to the Constitution, the deputies are elected for four years, but this was not to be applied to the present Parliament. By the recent decision Parliament is continuing its existence until September 30, and then new elections will take place. It is, unless unforeseen exigencies compel the High Council to call an extraordinary session, to assemble on September 15.

The Concessions.

The question of the concessions has not yet been solved, and the two most important, dealing with oil and State land respectively, have not yet been granted. It is possible that an extraordinary session will be held to settle these matters.

The zealous efforts being made by the representatives of different oil companies now in Tirana to get the concession signed as soon as possible strengthen the hope of the Albanian Government that there is a great quantity of oil to be found in this virgin land, which should revive the State economically, and that most probably explains why the Government is in no hurry to grant the concession. But it should not be forgotten that there is a political aspect to this question.

In regard to the State land concession, the Government was ready to submit it to Parliament as soon as Signor Fabiani, the representative of the Adriatico Co., should be ready to sign it. But when on the point of signing it Signor Fabiani proposed some new modifications, and the Government, having, therefore, to consider them thoroughly, could not present the contract to Parliament.

Land for Refugees

One of the most important laws which were passed in this session was the one dealing with the grant of State lands to the refugees who are for the present in Albania, and to those who will come later. After the Armistice large numbers of Kossovo and Cameria Albanians, who suffered such treatment from the Serbian and Greek authorities as to make life impossible for them, were forced to immigrate into Turkey. This law has been passed to assure land and abode to these refugees. As a consequence, the population of political Albania, which, owing to the inroads of various invaders, has been reduced to about 850,000, will be increased. Further, with a view to ameliorating the lot of the tenants, this law provides for pieces of land belonging to the State to be given to them.

The Minorities.

The position of tenants tilling lands owned by private individuals is also assured by a law, which has just been passed by Parliament, stating that no owner of land has the right to dismiss his tenant if the latter continues to fulfil all the obligations which he undertook in the contract entered into between the landowner and himself. The passing of this law was chiefly owing to the complaints of the Greek tenants of Argyrocastro against their landowners; and it shows, therefore, very clearly the sincerity of the Albanian Government in trying to accommodate the minorities under its rule—even to such an extent as is not required by the conventional declaration which the League of Nations forced upon Albania, and which practically creates an imperium in imperio.

While Albania is taking the most liberal steps to improve the position of her insignificant Greek minorities, it is disappointing to see the Greek Government taking the most rigid expropriatory measures in similar cases. Albanians in Greece can neither sell nor rent their land, because the expropriation law in force, which is in reality a law of confiscation, takes away the land from the Albanians at one-fifteenth of the real price, and this to be paid in thirty years! This is an illuminating comparison of the methods of the two Governments —the Albanian and the Greek—in dealing with their minorities.

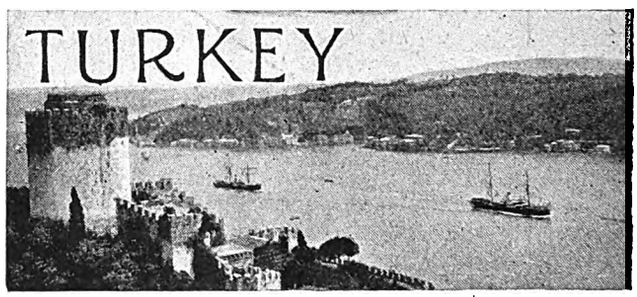
TURKEY



Constantinople, July 17.

The Elusive Peace.

The burst of enthusiasm which greeted the announcement that all difficulties had been resolved at Lausanne has been steadily evaporating throughout the week. Various restaurants had advertised "peace" dances; the Evkaf was credited with having given instructions for the illumination of mosques, and various other celebrations were being prepared; but gradually the news began to filter through that the all-powerful Angora had refused to associate itself with the feeling of its representatives in Lausanne, and intended to go on haggling to the bitter end. That delicate barometer of the political atmosphere, the rate of exchange, refused to confirm the optimistic press reports of Monday and Tuesday last, and the past week has seen a gentle but progressive weakening of Turkish currency.

Naturally, we are all asking ourselves what line the "Great Powers" will adopt towards this last intransigeance of Mustapha Kemal and his followers, and in our heart of hearts we know perfectly well that they will give way again. At any rate, they will give away the substance even if they succeed in retaining the shadow. After all, if the Powers have consciously decided that the new Turkey shall be left to the tender mercies of the laws of economics, there is no reason why they should hold out on the points of detail such as the Armstrong-Vickers and Régie Générale concessions and the order of the going of the Allied naval forces in the Orient. If they are worried about the safety of their nationals on Turkish territory and are trying to make a belated amende honorable for the wholesale abolition of any sort of guarantees against Turkish justice and victimisation, it may be suggested that they are wasting their time. The history of Allied efforts, under conditions of Allied military occupation during the past eight months, at getting redress for unprovoked assault against Allied persons and interests does not inspire any confidence in the capacity of a few units of the Allied fleets to do what the Allied armies have failed to achieve.

The Recognition of Angora.

The preceding argument assumes what—to its perspicacity be it attributed—the British Government was the last of the Allied Governments to assume—namely, that the Angora Oligarchy is the rightful and permanent heir in direct succession to the Imperial Ottoman Government. Your correspondent would humbly suggest that a comparatively short space of time will serve to prove that the present self-nominated Angora Government is counting on British recognition to support its claim; also that the withdrawal of the tacit recognition by the British Government of the justice of the claim of Mustapha Kemal that they rule Turkey de jure would be a fatal blow to the incompetent parvenus who have grasped the nettle of executive power in Turkey.

The moral is obvious, and need not be underlined.

The Treatment of Constantinople.

The question of the status and treatment of Constantinople is still very much to the fore, and the Press has been canvassing the deputies and other prominent personages on the question of the application of the dry régime and the possibility of the return of the Government to the predestined capital of the country. The Aurora believes that the consensus of opinion of the newly elected deputies for Constantinople inclines to the theory that the strict application of the dry régime here would be an error in tactics, and would deprive the Government of much-needed revenue; and it believes that the fateful August 1 will see a postponement sine die of the application of the measure to Constantinople and Smyrna in the interests of the Treasury's revenue. If this expression of opinion has any repercussion in Angora circles generally, it will be welcomed as a glimmering of common sense in a world of bigotry.

Much ink is being expended in the Press on the question of the return of the Government to Constantinople. The Stamboul reproduces certain declarations said to have been made to the Tanin by Fethi Bey, Minister of the Interior, which for pure futility are difficult to equal. This politician affects to believe that the inestimable benefits which will accrue to an Angora-run Turkey will rain like manna upon a Turkified Constantinople, which will maintain and increase its value as a great entrepôt for transit trade, all of which will be in Turkish hands, to the exclusion of the foreign and non-Turkish element. To anyone with the slightest practical knowledge of Turkish commercial methods, Turkish employees, and so on, the idea is simply ludicrous. People like Fethi Bey are inebriated by the Chester Concession, and strong in their faith that Americans rush in where Europeans fear to tread, they are stupidly flouting every other source of possible help. What an unpleasant surprise they are going to get when they find that the American concessionnaire is not so gullible as he appears, and that he will willingly sacrifice a few thousand dollars as the price of cutting loose until times are more propitious, happy in the possession of the expert information as to the resources of the country which those same few thousands of dollars have cost him in prospecting. However, they will have to learn their lesson by bitter experience.

The Elections.

The Turkish elections are officially proceeding, but various parts of Anatolia are showing great restiveness under the system of pressure which is being applied in order to secure the election of Government deputies to the exclusion of all others. The population of Angora itself raised its voice, and demanded that it should have a say in the choice of the candidates who were to request their suffrages. Adana appears to have placed its faith in deeds rather than in words, and to have organised a general assault upon the ballot boxes by an enraged body of citizens. The Eastern vilayets, and especially Samsoun and Trebizond, appear to be staging a mild revolution, which necessitates vigorous methods of military repression. These methods do not appear to have been very successful, for reports are filtering through which suggest that the troops are demoralised and are in many cases making common cause with the population. Considerable colour is lent to such reports by the impenetrable silence of official sources and of the Press on the subject. Whatever happens, it seems to be generally agreed that the new Assembly cannot meet until early in August, and inspired statements fix the opening session for August 2. We will wait and see.

General News.

Local affairs in Constantinople are not particularly interesting. The Patriarch has at last left on the Khedivial mail boat, leaving the governance of the Church in the hands of the Patriarchal Synod, under the presidency of Archbishop Nikolaus of Caesarea, the late locum tenens, who has declared himself in favour of an exchange of views with the Government, with the object of regulating the basis of relations between Church and State on those obtaining in England, France, and so on. A delegation is said to be proceeding to Angora for this purpose in the near future.

Reasonable protests are being raised against suggestions that any sweeping rules shall be made for the observance of Friday as a day of rest, for, as it is pointed out, business is already suspended on Fridays and Sundays, and, to be absolutely consistent in a city with such a mixed population, everything should be shut up on Fridays, Saturdays, and Sundays. A certain latitude is obviously necessary.

The police are justifying their existence by discovering a widespread network of incendiaries—of Armenian race—who are said to be responsible, in collusion with certain employees of insurance companies, for many of the fires which have taken place during the past two years.

PERSIA.

Teheran, June 11.

The Cabinet.

Mustaufi el Mumalik's Cabinet would appear to be on its last legs. Some days ago the majority in Parliament turned against him, and a vote of lack of confidence in the Government was passed by 44 votes to 39. The Opposition thereupon clamoured for his resignation, while the Premier's supporters endeavoured to postpone it for the time being in view of the approaching dissolution of the present Mejliss, whose term of office expires on 22nd instant. A deadlock ensued, during which time the Mejliss has held no public sessions, as one or the other part always leaves the House and prevents the presence of a quorum. A few days ago the President of the Parliament, Motamen ul

Digitized by Google

Mulk, had an audience of the Shah, at which he referred the question to His Majesty, who expressed his opinion that the resignation of Mustaufi el Mumalik at the present juncture was undesirable, in view of the impending dissolution of Parliament during the next few days, for should Mustaufi resign and difficulty be experienced in forming a new Cabinet there would be the danger of the country remaining without either a Mejliss or Government. This was reported to the Opposition, who seemed to acquiesce, but apparently the crisis is not yet over, for it is understood the Parliament has summoned the Prime Minister and his Cabinet to appear at the Mejliss to explain matters, which is equivalent to an impeachment. Should this result in a vote of non-confidence Mustaufi will, of course, have no alternative but to resign, but the majority may be willing to fall in with the Shah's wishes, and in this case the Ministry will remain in power, for the time being at least.

The Elections.

The elections for the new Mejliss have been proceeding throughout the country during the past two weeks, and although voting has finished in Teheran the scrutiny of the votes has not yet been completed, and the final result is not known. Up to the present Motamen ul Mulk, President of the Parliament, heads the list, followed by Mushir ed Dowleh, Soleiman Mirza, leader of the Democrats, and the present Prime Minister, Mustaufi el Mumalik. Mirza Hussein Khan Alai, Minister at Washington, who has much to do with the engagement of the American advisers, is so far among the twelve representatives, as is also Seyed Zia ed Din, the proprietor of the newspaper Raad, who brought about the short-lived coup d'état of February, 1921, and who since his flight after three months' Premiership has been travelling in Europe.

The Earthquake.

A violent earthquake, the worst experienced in this country for very many years, caused tremendous damage to property and exacted a heavy toll of lives at Turbat-i-Haidari, south of Meshed, and the neighbouring villages on May 26. A great number of shocks, which continued for several days, were felt, and the majority of the houses in Turbat are said to have been damaged, and fifty inhabitants were killed. It is almost impossible in this country to obtain accurate statistics; but reliable information estimates the death-roll among the neighbouring villages, of which several were completely destroyed, at well over 2,000. Relief was immediately sent from Meshed, and the Commander of the Eastern Army himself repaired at once to the afflicted district with a party of troops to render assistance and organise relief measures. A public subscription has been started, and the Shah is to-day calling together a meeting of priests and notables to consider the best steps to be taken to relieve the distressed population.

Military Training in France.

Last Sunday a party of forty officer students left Teheran for France, where they will undergo a course of military training at the College of St. Cyr, studying modern warfare in all its phases. They were accompanied by General Amanullah Mirza, the Chief of the Staff, and four other senior officers, who will also study military matters in Europe before returning. The party is, of course, being sent at the Government's expense, at the suggestion of the Minister of War, who thus furnishes another proof of his desire for the advancement of the Persian Army, which he has been instrumental in forming on modern lines, and his anxiety to profit by the experience of the French Army in the War shows his broad-mindedness.

The King's Birthday.

The King's Birthday falling on Sunday this year, the annual reception at the British Legation was held last Saturday, June 2. Of late years it has been the practice to hold the reception after dinner in the cool of the evening in the delightful gardens of the Legation in town; and this year, in spite of a strong wind and heavy showers both before 10 o'clock and after midnight, the Clerk of the Weather proved kind, and a very large number of guests, including all members of the Diplomatic Corps, Persian Ministers of State and notables, and the majority of the European colony, partook of Sir Percy Loraine's hospitality.

The Weather.

Most of the Legations and those whose work permits them to do so, have moved up country to escape the heat and dust of town during the summer months, in the cool villages on the lower slopes of the Elburz Mountains, seven or eight miles from the capital. The weather, however, has been remarkable, and such a cool spring has seldom been experienced. Rain has fallen frequently the last few weeks, and up country heavy downpours have recently been the order of the day—a most unusual thing for the time of year. In fact, the vagaries of the weather throughout the country of late have been the cause of much comment, and have caused serious damage, as witness the recent floods in Kerman due to an abnormal rainfall; similar floods resulting in the river Helmund at Seistan (Nasratabad) overflowing its banks, and causing immense damage to crops and property, and, lastly, the disastrous earthquake in Khorassan, which, although an acknowledged centre of seismic disturbance, has seldom experienced such a devastating series of shocks.

BULGARIA AND THE ÆGEAN.

At the last Plenary Session of the Lausanne Conference, at the Château d'Ouchy, on July 17, M. D. Stancioff (Bulgarian Minister in London), Delegate for Bulgaria, following the speeches of the other delegates, addressed the Assembly as follows: "Your Excellencies have met at Lausanne with the view of settling the problems of the Near East. Bulgaria was invited to this Conference, as being a country bordering the Black Sea, to partake in the establishment of the régime of the Straits and, also, for the purpose of securing the Bulgarian Outlet to the Ægean Sea. The Bulgarian Delegation has had the opportunity of stating before the Conference the views of Bulgaria on this subject, and of expressing her gratitude to the competent Commission for the interest granted to a question of such vital importance to Bulgaria.

"As, however, it has not been possible for this High Assembly to come to a decision on this particular point, I beg to be allowed to express the hope that with the benevolent help of all the Powers represented at this Conference, we Bulgarians may look forward in the immediate future to an agreement which will at last finally settle the problem—left without solution—of Bulgaria's free access to the Ægean Sea.

"The memorable sitting of to-day sanctions the guarantees indispensable to the pacific expansion of nations, and I venture to express the wish that the advantages and benefits deriving from complete security be enjoyed, without exception, by all countries of the Near East that have had to endure so many heavy trials and hardships. It is in this sense that the Bulgarian Delegation shares the general satisfaction felt at the happy result of the labours of this Conference."

This statement was very well received by all the Delegations present.

THE CLEAN SLATE IN THE EAST.

While this issue of THE NEAR EAST goes to press, the Treaty of Peace between the Allied Powers and Turkey is to be signed in the Hall of the Lausanne University. The circumstances of this long-drawn agony—the abortive Treaty of Sèvres, the Anatolian campaign, and the protracted negotiations at Lausanne—preclude any enthusiasm over the event—at least, in Great Britain. Nevertheless, there are sound reasons why the relief which will necessarily be felt at the prospect of a settlement at last in the Near East should be accompanied by genuine satisfaction. We are apt to think only of Turkey defeated in the Great War, rejecting the conditions of peace offered her, and finally, in effect, laying down the terms on which she will consent to be at peace with the Allies; and the recital leaves a feeling of humiliation. There is, however, another aspect of the matter. If ever wrongdoing brings retribution in its train, the Allies' handling of the Turkish question has supplied a classic instance. With the world still echoing with their unctuous phrases of the rights of nations, the Supreme Council deliberately commissioned Greece, who had not been in conflict with the Turks in the Great War, to take advantage of Turkey's exhaustion in order to settle her own quarrel over Asia Minor. The end in view may have been most worthy; but the method employed by the Allies was not justified. By their action they stepped down from their Western pedestal and placed themselves in the sphere of morality on a level with Turkey. The injustice galvanised the Turks to life again, and though they are inclined to attribute the striking reversal of their fortunes to their own strong arm, the Allies, on their part, can hardly fail to be conscious that it was on account of having sacrificed their moral superiority, as well as their will to war, that they found themselves at a disadvantage in the council chamber at Lausanne. The terms of peace, however grudgingly given, have not only righted the wrong, but should also have rehabilitated the Allies in their own self-respect. The old political relations with Turkey have gone; but, as far as moral values are concerned, the Allies are once more back on their own plane, and the future will show whether the Turks are able to join them there or will be content with their former inferior standard.

It would be false to the spirit of the Treaty to grudge Turkey her elation over the victory of peace, which she claims rests with her, or to seek to qualify the international equality which the Lausanne Conference implied. The Allies, it is true, would be stultifying themselves if they did not have their misgivings as to the future; but they must make up their minds that no action on their part shall restrict the opportunity of the Turks to make good. Turkey's viciousness in the past has been materially assisted by, even if it was not largely or in part due to, the intrigues of the Western Powers in Constantinople. Allied unity has been displayed to better effect at Lausanne than in any other part of the world, and although it may, even there, not have been much to boast about, it was at least proof against the endeavours of the Turks to sow discord. If that unity can be maintained, to the extent required for the elimination of active intrigue on the part of any one Power against another, Turkey will be thrown more upon her own resources. Instead of adopting a purely negative attitude, relying upon the Powers of themselves to counteract their own plans for the betterment of the Near East, the Turks will discover the need for a constructive policy. They protest that up to the present they have never had a chance of showing what they can do. Now that they are left entirely to their own resources, it is to the Allies' interests to give them all the encouragement and help that they require. If with this assistance Turkey wins through to a satisfactory position in the comity of nations, the Allies will benefit; if, in spite of this assistance, she fails from an inherent lack of capacity, the Allies' task in the end will be the easier, for the Turks will then be unable to plead that they have been handicapped either by the indifference or by the active opposition of Europe.

For the Turks the slate is cleaner than, perhaps, they realise at the moment. They are rid of the disintegrating influences that sapped the Ottoman Empire, for in Anatolia they have achieved national homogeneity. European intrigue is unlikely to trouble them, unless they go out of their way to encourage it. Their main stumbling-block will be the hatred of the foreigner, which has given to their country the solidarity and motive power necessary for military victory, but which, for success in peace time, must give place to real appreciation of what the foreigner has achieved, and determination to benefit from his knowledge and experience. If they imagine themselves as superior to the foreigner and all his ways in the cult of material progress, as they proved to be on the field of battle against a dispirited Greek army, they will inevitably compass their own undoing. If they were capable of studying the pages of history, they would discover that they could learn much from the lesson of the Far East. Sixty years ago the Japanese had raised hatred of the foreigner to a national fetish. Only when it had led to defeat and threatened disaster did they abandon it. At once the old traditions of rigid seclusion were replaced by an amazing keenness to learn all that the West had to teach. Western advisers were obtained for every department of public life, and the whole nation went to school, with the result that within forty years Japan stood on her own feet, a First-class Power, commanding the respect of the whole world. Separated from her by a narrow sea was a country which preferred to cling, in spite of every warning, to its old policy of seclusion, and which sought to maintain before the world its conviction that misgovernment within its borders was its own affair, and of no concern to others. To-day Turkey is at the parting of the ways, the one leading along the road which Japan has followed to some purpose, the other offering her the fate of Korea. Which will she choose? The decision rests with the Turks; but, whatever the issue, Great Britain's conscience will be clear only if she contrives to do all within her power to lend a helping hand. Turkey at first may elect to make no use of it; but it should be available notwithstanding. If an attempt is made to impose upon Angora the dignity of a capital, a British representative should be in residence there, and he should be a man to whom both official and unofficial Turkey can always turn for sympathy and advice.

EXCAVATIONS AT CARTHAGE.

By DR. L. CARTON.

The visitor to Carthage generally expects to find, as at so many other celebrated ruins, temples and porticos still standing. Charmed at first by the incomparable beauty of the site, with the blue waters of the Gulf lapping the foot of the Mountain of the Two Horns—Bou Kornine—he is disappointed when, on turning his gaze to his immediate surroundings, he looks in vain on the sacred soil of Ancient Carthage for the remains of the famous city. The reason is that these, just as if the curse of old Cato still brooded on the unhappy relics, have never ceased throughout the ages to be the object of the worst ravages. Here for a space three kilometres long the ancient monuments, hidden away at the bottom of the holes where they have been discovered, with the approaches not yet cleared, are invisible from any distance. Robbed of their mosaics, their statues and their columns, which have been taken away to museums, they have been too often abandoned and turned into quarries. The marvel of it all is that after so many depredations the soil still yields up each day its wonderful riches. If the visitor, warned by what he has read or by a well-informed guide, comes across monuments thus hidden, he realises with an indescribable emotion that, although there may be no temples still standing, these remains have none the less a powerful attraction, not only owing to the grandeur of the memories that they evoke, to the majesty of the site which serves them as a frame, but also by their state of preservation, the originality of their arrangement, the sumptuousness of their decoration, and the documentary importance of the débris. For—and this is a point to remember—it is not only the classical monuments of the Roman cities that one can see at Carthage, but also a number of edifices rendered notable by the legends attaching to them or by the originality of their construction. Such—among the chief—are the Amphitheatre where Perpetua was martyred, and the Theatre where Apuleius, amid the enthusiastic applause of the spectators, delivered his oration, and where, later, the celebrated writer, Louis Bertrand, commemorated in eloquent terms the centenary of Gustave Flaubert. Such, too, the Basilica which witnessed the "Tears of Ste. Monica." And, in the second category, the curious subterranean rotunda, the charming fountain of a thousand amphoræ, the so-called Baths of Dido and Prison of Perpetua.

Over and above all these remains, relatively recent, must be mentioned those of the great city of Hamilcar, which was believed to have been lost for ever, because up to that time the excavations undertaken to discover them had not been either numerous or deep enough, and which has just been found bit by bit at different points, after I had recommended a different line of search. It was impossible that the soldiers of Scipio should have been able, in a few months, to destroy the lower parts of the buildings under the three or four yards of rubbish from the upper storeys that covered them.

Punic Carthage was, without doubt, mainly destroyed later by those who, in order to rebuild the Roman town, looked for their materials, as do the modern vandals, in the depths of the ground. One can realise how this destruction, carried out without method, has left unscathed portions of the first city which are now beginning to be found under the remains of Roman Carthage.

It is thus that the site which at the first approach seems almost entirely bare of ruins produces no less than seventy in all, well preserved in whole or in part, and in every respect admirable.

Here I will refer only to the principal ruins: The Theatre, whose echoes were first re-awakened by great artists at my instigation in 1907, in an unforgettable performance, and where more than thirty magnificent statues were found, which have been removed to the Museum; the Odeon; the Temple of Memory, with its mysterious plan; the street lined with luxurious dwellings, ornamented with magnificent mosaics which have been extracted from the soil; the unidentified temple near the Cathedral; the line of fine decorated shrines known as the Palace of the Proconsul; a subterranean chapel adorned with a fresco representing St. Cyprian, and which the damp is eating away day by day; the great wall of Byrsa, on the top of which a hotel has been built; the circus not yet excavated: the enormous cisterns of the Malga and those of Bord Djedid, restored and full of water; the enormous masses of unexplored vaults of the Baths of Antoninus, where columns and mosaics crop out; three magnificent Christian Basilicas, with columns and mosaics; the great Punic tombs of the VIIth Century B.C.; the Ceramicos or the quarter of Carthaginian potters, with its ovens; the enormous wall, or maritime enclosure, with the remains of fortresses; the ancient harbours, with the round island containing a large ruin.

The soil of Carthage has not yet been exhausted. It still contains monuments infinitely precious. No other proof of this is needed than the magnificent discoveries made in recent years, of which I will mention a few.

First of all there was the great Basilica of St. Cyprian. Père Delattre, who discovered it, has set up the forest of mutilated columns over the deep ravines and the gulf of blue waters. Here hundreds of inscriptions have revealed the names of the early Christians. Then there is the poetic fountain of a thousand amphoræ, the exploration of which has enabled me to bring to light the only spring known to Carthage, a series of reservoirs, vaults, and galleries, forty metres long, in an admirable state of preservation, which receives the water as it falls into a chamber excavated out of the rock at the edge of the seashore. Authors are of opinion, with some reason, that it is here, near a spring of water, that the first Phœnician settlement was established, and that the legendary Dido disembarked.

Was not one of the most impressive discoveries that recently made by an Arab stone-breaker, under the eyes of those modest and zealous devotees of science MM. Gielly and Icard, the vast sanctuary of Tanit? The fervour of the worshippers of the great goddess had collected there in six layers, one on top of the other, monuments in the form of pre-Carthaginian dolmens, then altars of early Egyptian character, then Punic stelæ, on which is repeated thousands of times the invocation: "To Tanit, face of Baal, because he has heard her voice." At the foot of the votive stones were hundreds of urns containing the bones of newly born children offered in sacrifice. Alas! these precious archives of the Carthaginian cult have just been extracted from the earth, to which the worshippers of Tanit had consigned them centuries and centuries before, some abandoned to all kinds of damage at the bottom of a hole heaped up with rubbish everyday, others exhibited, laid out in straight lines on the shelves of the Museum for which this sacrilege had been committed.

Happily there is reason to hope that this sanctuary still extends under the villas that have been allowed to be built upon it, although no borings have actually been made as far as the virgin soil, and that one day, when at last the necessity of preserving the remains where they are is appreciated, the stelae will be cleared with feelings of piety.

The possibility of the existence of Punic traces, as I have declared for several years, has been proved by the wreck of the whole of this Carthaginian part, across which a trench was made for the construction of a road, bringing to light an enormous mass of débris of terra cotta statues. The pitiless roller levelled the whole, preventing exploration. Only several years later was I able, by means of a tunnel passing under the road, in which I crawled at full length under the electric wires, to establish the existence of a Punic structure with a Punic altar and two Punic mosaics, where I collected an enormous quantity of débris, and these, patiently reconstructed, have furnished me with Carthaginian statues, surmounted with a high tiara, the hair bound with bands of gold; busts of priestesses offering incense still posed on the altar where the pious hands of the priests had placed them; an admirable head of Baal-Hammon, many-coloured, wearing a crown of feathers; two warriors, a Gorgon's head—a masterpiece—a gigantic grinning mask placed at the entrance to the monument, effigies of serpents, horses and lions; delicious statuettes recalling the very best Tanagra; small delicate figures in ivory, etc. This monument, which it has not been possible yet to explore in its entirety, lies actually under the track furrowed by vehicles.

I have written enough to show what a splendid series of monuments is to be met with in the soil of Carthage, and what an abundant harvest it still promises to those who explore it.

A group of Americans who, under the guidance of M. le Comte Byron-Kuhn de Prorok, came to visit Carthage two years ago, and approached me through M. L. Bertrand, the celebrated author of "Villes d'Or," were enamoured with the grandeur of the ruin and its sufferings; they rented an ancient monument which someone had converted into a house by making windows in the arches, inserting a chimney, and so on. On this spot, where inadequate digging had led to the belief that there was nothing, and that building could be allowed, the Americans found a large Roman villa with walls three metres high, with several fine mosaics intact, representing a variety of subjects; a wild boar hunt; fish, fowls, fruits, etc. It is to be hoped that this time these things will be preserved where they have been found.

These fortunate discoveries enabled the Americans to give a series of illustrated lectures in the United States, and the University of Harvard, at their instigation, is in treaty at this moment with the Government of Tunis for carrying out excavations over a large area, beginning next November. They will direct their attention in all probability to the region where the Baths of Gargilius are hypothetically located, not far from the Theatre.

It may not be without interest to readers of THE NEAR EAST to know that among the hundreds of people who this year have visited the ruins of Carthage, a number of Englishmen have formed the project of returning to Carthage to obtain authority to excavate. I am the happier to be able to announce this, because up to the present our neighbours and Allies have not taken any special interest in the great ruins.

Another excavation area will shortly be marked out at Carthage by Le Comité des Dames Amies de Carthage, under my direction, in a ruin which so far has not been explored. This society has been formed by a group of generous ladies who have been moved by a great "compassion" for the ruins. Visitors to Carthage join the committee enthusiastically in great numbers. After being only three years in existence, it comprises a thousand members, and has important branches at Tunis, Paris, Algiers, Bordeaux, and Constantine, as well as in Switzerland, Belgium, Italy, etc. So far there is no branch in England where the committee would much like to have one, as Carthage now begins to have its friends there. Under the high patronage of Mme. Lucien Saint, wife of the Resident-General, and having as "Membres d'Honneur" the Duchess of Vendôme, the Beya of Tunis, Mme. Destrees, wife of the Belgian Minister of Public Instruction, etc.; it publishes a bulletin on Carthage, which keeps the members in touch with all that happens there. By way of a start, it has facilitated inspection of the site by placing at the station a large plan of the ruins, by opening an Information Bureau, by placing signposts and plans in the monuments, and in giving a subsidy to Père Delattre. As the most pressing need was to prevent the invasion of the ruins by buildings, which are rising in every direction, and their destruction by contractors, the C.D.A.C., under the presidency of Mme. Carton, made a special effort in appealing to the public, with the result that the Press of the world is now at one in demanding the preservation of Carthage. The committee wanted to restore, at its own cost, certain columns and to strengthen and enclose some of the ruins, but, for reasons of an administrative character, the necessary authority has not yet been accorded it.

Preparations are being made for grand theatrical performances this winter in Paris, and in the spring at the ancient Theatre of Carthage, and, in order to cope with this splendid development of the work, an office is about to be opened in Paris under the direction of my colleague, M. Jaubert de Benac, a talented writer devoted to the cause of Carthage. Time presses. Nearly a hundred buildings have been erected within a year at Carthage. If within the next few months the indispensable measures are not taken, it will be too late.

EDUCATION IN CYPRUS.

We have received from the Greek Press Bureau at Limassol the following telegram:—"A strong protest on the part of the Holy Synod, accompanied by a long memorandum, was submitted yesterday to the Colonial Secretary against the interference by the Government in the matter of Education. All the Metropolitans have resigned their presidentships. Out of six towns three committees undertook their duties under protest and issued resolutions against the plans of the Government. The other three still abstain from the performance of their duties. The Press strongly criticises the authorities, and expresses the hope that the Government will no longer deny justice to the Cypriots, who, with the rest of the Greek nation, made great sacrifices for a common cause in the Great War. People here hope for the support of the English Press."

THE ROYAL ASIATIC SOCIETY.

In connection with the centenary of the Royal Asiatic Society, sectional meetings were held on July 18 at 74, Grosvenor Street. On the following day sectional meetings were again held, some of the society's delegates were received by the King at Buckingham Palace, and in the evening the society was represented at the meeting of the India Society at 21, Cromwell Road, when speeches were made by Sir C. Hercules Read and M. Emile Senart. The centenary celebrations were concluded on July 20, when foreign and oversea members were conducted on a tour through the British Museum. In the evening a banquet was given at the Hotel Cecil under the chairmanship of Lord Chalmers, and was attended by nearly 200 guests.

The Queen of Roumania has left Bucharest for a month's stay at Sovata, the well-known spa in Transylvania, where her Majesty will take the waters.

THE DEFENCE OF INDIA.

"THE DEFENCE OF INDIA." By Arthur Vincent. (London: Humphrey Milford. 3s. net.)

The author of this book, writing under the name of "Arthur Vincent," has dedicated it, by permission, to General Sir M. Jacob, Chief of the General Staff in India. It contains a large amount of valuable material compressed into ninety-five pages of closely printed matter, and is one of the "India of To-day" series. The book is divided into three parts—viz., Part I.: Maritime Defence and the Northern and North-Eastern Frontiers and Burma; Part II.: The North-West Frontier; and Part III.: Future Days.

The chapter on maritime defence tells us how the centre of possible naval activity lies no longer in the European seas, but is to be found in the East and the Pacific; how the key to the strategical defence of India is to the eastward—e.g., in the closing of the barrier of Singapore by fleets which can be based upon that harbour; how India's naval needs are three in number, in order of importance as follows:—(1) Protection of sea communications, (2) protection of her ports and coasts, (3) provision of naval bases, dockyards, fuel reserves, and so on. The author then proceeds to develop the subject of India's responsibility for her own naval defence. Next follows a chapter dealing with the Northern, North-Eastern, and Burma frontiers. Little need be said (as regards the defence problem) of the first, as it is "one vast wall of high mountains, including Mount Everest," and is "the greatest natural barrier in the world." The second—the North-Eastern Frontier—has not attracted hitherto so much attention as that on the north-west, but the former might become of the very greatest importance any day should Chinese policy again become active. China, with her vast and ever-increasing population, must find an outlet somewhere, and the tendency has been so far for her to expand towards west and south—i.e., on the side of India and Tibet. In connection with this possible danger the author draws attention to the strategical advantages of the Hukong valley route for a railway from Assam to Burma, a subject of the highest importance which, but for the Great War, would probably by this time have been prominently before us.

Part II. follows, dealing with the North-West Frontier. An interesting chapter on the birth and growth of the present frontier is given, in which it is shown sufficiently clearly that the protection of the present frontier has been undertaken solely with a view to counteracting aggression from the west and in defence of "a united India." There are also references to the "Durand" line and to "the buffer State policy." Brief notices are given of the three Afghan wars, and of the danger threatening India from Soviet Russia. Chapter IV. gives an interesting brief account of the border countries, the author remarking very truly that the allegiance of some of the frontier tribes is based on two factors alone: first, the extent to which a peaceful and orderly existence has suited their own purposes for the time being; and, secondly, the strength of the Army of India. The second consideration was uppermost probably in the mind of the author whilst writing this account, in view of the policy of reduction of the Indian Army and of hastening the "Indianisation" of the military services. The moral of the chapter is that it would be most imprudent to reduce the Army below a certain safety limit. The author tells us there are now over 140,000 breech-loading rifles in the hands of some of the most important frontier tribesmen; this is a fact which should be borne in mind by those who are so ready to attack the Army estimates. Chapter V. gives a short description of frontier policy, a matter for frontier experts which may be left to them, including the suggestion of a permanent advance of British control up to the "Durand" line. Chapter VI. treats of the frontier army, and contains, incidentally, some account of that fine body of men "the Punjab Frontier Force." We are again reminded of the Russian menace in Chapter VII., and Lenin's words at the Third International at Moscow are recalled—e.g., "England is our greatest enemy in the world. British Imperialism is a pest which spreads everywhere. Our task is to root out the British Imperialistic spirit in Turkey, in Persia, and in Asia generally. In India we must strike them hardest. The road to London is through Kabul and India."

The book ends with "a look to the future," which chapter, and, indeed, the whole of this interesting and highly informing book, may be recommended specially to Indian legislators and to those others also who wish to form some idea of the duties and responsibilities of India as regards defence at the present time. Should another edition be published, it is suggested that a better map of the North-West Frontier be supplied, also a map of the North-Eastern and Burma frontiers. The book has been well-printed and is moderately priced; it should command a wide circle of readers, in addition to those classes mentioned above.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

The West and Turkey.

Under the title of "The Flicker of Lausanne," The Times of July 18 discusses the peace that is to come at Lausanne. Of that peace it says: "When it does come, it will not be a shining garment; it will be a dull, drab affair, of homely texture, frayed here and there, and not perfectly sound in the seams." It comments on the general character of the peace, emphasising the new form of relationship that has grown up between the West and Turkey—a Turkey which has determined to be ruthlessly uniform and ruthlessly modern. Service by foreigners the Turk will not have at all, and will take upon himself all the manifold functions of nationality. We must, moreover, accept the new situation for what it is worth, though the conditions are unfavourable for the Turk's experiment:—

> The country is exhausted by war; its population is heavily reduced; the idea of nationality that gathered strength in the primitive environment of the interior of Anatolia has to be applied amid all those complexities of modern life which will make themselves felt as soon as peace is signed and innumerable tasks of administration, education, sanitation, and economic reconstruction thrust themselves upon the ill-equipped pioneers of a new Turkey. The prospect is not alluring, and not a few of those who knew Turkey as she was regard it with grave alarm. It is useless to complain. The new facts are there, and they are being slowly registered in an extraordinary treaty of peace. The world will have to recognise the very chastening lessons that the treaty contains. Even to get such a treaty has been an immense labour. Sound politics in such a situation means taking the Turks as they are and as they have become. We may regret the past, but we cannot recall it. After all, many of the aspirations of the Turkish Nationalists are by no means ignoble. They have been stirred by the impulses of the West, and if they show initiative and want to do themselves, in their own way and for their own nation, what they formerly allowed others to do, they will make a thousand mistakes, they will do a great deal of damage, but they may learn the lesson. They reject outside assistance now. The time may come when they will clamour for it. There is need to be patient in the interval, and to be prepared to give aid when it is required, wisely and not without hope.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London,
Tuesday Morning.

The Harvest Outlook.

After an unduly prolonged spell of woman-like indecision, the monsoon has deigned to smile (or rather to weep) on India, and all will apparently be well with the Dominion for another twelve months. India has been the one uncertain quantity as regards this year's harvests, and now it would seem that we are in for a period of excellent crops all round. Was it for this year, by the way, or next that we were promised the unexampled dearth? The result of the good harvests will be generally to give a great and much-needed impetus to trade, and the authorities have been perhaps a little premature in suggesting that worse times are in store for us, though it is naturally impossible to feel any undue optimism till the Ruhr problem is a thing of the past.

The Turkish Settlement.

While it is eminently satisfactory that a settlement of any kind should at last have been reached at Lausanne, it would be idle to pretend that the arrangement which has terminated the Conference is in any way ideal or is one which does not contain by way of omission rather than commission the seeds of possible future complications. Not to make too fine a point, agreement was arrived at by the shelving of the more controversial matters, such as the Ottoman Debt coupons, concessions, and kindred subjects. At the closing meeting no settlement was forthcoming as regards the Ottoman Debt, Ismet Pasha taking the line that Turkey is too poor to meet the coupons in gold. So the matter goes for discussion between the bondholders and Turkey, and it is difficult to find grounds for supposing that those directly interested in the coupons will be able to bring the Turks to a more amenable state of mind than the delegates could. The statement that the Allies affirm the validity of the Decree of Muharran and reserve to themselves the right to intervene to protect the interests of their subjects takes us nowhere in the face of the very obvious intransigence of the Turks.

The Concession Question.

It is much the same as regards concessions. An example of the unsatisfactory position in this respect is to be found in the fact that the holders of two of the most important concessions, who as regards their existing concessions are given the right of compensation or an equivalent new concession, are given the right for five years to compete on equal terms with any other company for any part of the Chester Concession which may not have been taken over. When the essential need of Turkey is rapid reconstruction, it is impossible not to feel impatient with a policy such as this, which leads nowhere. It is true that few now take the much-heralded American concession seriously, and at no time indeed did it appear probable that the gigantic series of schemes constituting it could possibly be carried out, but that does not make the position of other would-be concessionaires more happy.

The Furness, Withy Report.

Considering the general conditions that have obtained in the shipping industry for so many months past, the report of Messrs. Furness, Withy and Co. for the twelve months ended April 30 makes remarkably good reading. The net profits, after provision for taxation, amount to £552,500, as against £655,200 for the previous year, the bulk of the profits being derived, as on the previous occasion, mainly from the miscellaneous branches of the company's business and from investments, rather than from freight. Last year no alteration was made for depreciation, but this time £200,000 is transferred to the depreciation account. A dividend of 5 per cent. has been paid on the ordinary shares, and a bonus of 2½ per cent. is now recommended, bringing the distribution to 7½ per cent., as compared with 10 per cent., and leaving £202,315 to be carried forward. This year's distribution is the smallest for twelve years, but, while a much larger dividend could have been paid, it is impossible in the prevailing circumstances to question the wisdom of the policy of the directors in conserving the resources of the company.

Eastern Cable Companies.

Both the Eastern Telegraph Company and the Eastern Extension, Australasia, and China Telegraph Company report decreased revenues for 1922. As regards the former company, the gross revenue amounted to £3,489,100, the receipts from cable and similar sources totalling £3,413,000, a decline of £610,300, which was offset to a considerable extent by substantial economies. A dividend of 2½ per cent. is proposed, which will maintain the distribution at 10 per cent., tax free; £400,000 is placed to the reserve, and £515,300 is to be carried forward. The gross revenue of the Eastern Extension amounted to £2,061,520, the decline as regards cables being £372,200, while income from other sources improved. On the other hand expenditure rose, the available balance being £724,800. The usual dividend of 10 per cent. tax free takes £400,000, and the carry forward is £382,700. The main reason for the decreased revenues of these companies is undoubtedly to be found in the world-wide trade depression. The use of wireless, so far as one can judge, has not had much to do with it, though what will happen in the future in this respect is another matter.

Oil Notes and News.

ROUMANIAN OIL POSITION IN 1922.—II.

During the latter half of the year it appeared exceedingly difficult to obtain from the Ministry of Commerce permission to export. Then the situation in the Orient became uncertain, and for some weeks no effort was made to effect export business, it being considered dangerous to quote prices for export on account of the exchange. Towards the end of the year it was proposed to suspend export because of shortage of products for internal consumption.

The exports during 1922 prove that the traffic depends upon the taxes imposed. If the companies consider the taxes too high, they do not export, as, for instance, during 1921. The taxes being lower in 1922, export was lively in spite of the handicaps mentioned above, but it became certain towards the end of the year that the export taxes would be increased again. The taxes were collected in the currency of the country to which the products were destined, if the currency of such country was more normal than the Roumanian; thus the State was able to obtain foreign money, of which it was in need for purposes not connected with the oil industry.

Maximum Prices for Internal Consumption.

Throughout the year there was an outcry from the companies, protesting against the maximum prices of products for internal consumption, as loud as the outcry in 1921 against the export taxes which checked export for eight months of that year. The companies sent delegations to the Ministry with proposals, the Ministry made counter-proposals, and finally a regulation was proposed which, whilst increasing the maximum prices of products for internal consumption, also increased the export taxes; thus, what the State proposed to allow as extra on the internal consumption, they proposed to take back to some extent in export taxes.

The three principal companies in Roumania recorded profits for 1921 as follows: Romano Americana (Standard Oil), 193½ million lei on a capital of 200 millions; Astra Romana (Royal Dutch Shell), 228 millions on a capital of 225 millions; Steaua Romana (Roumanian, British, French), 139 millions on a capital of 310 millions. These apparently formidable profits are frequently alluded to by the Government as indicative of the excessive profits made in the industry, and this the companies deny. It has to be remembered that the profits quoted above are in paper lei, whilst the capital of the three companies was subscribed—at any rate partly—in the equivalent of gold. The quotations of oil shares in lei at the Bucharest exchange show what a difference this makes. A 50 per cent. recorded profit was reported as equivalent to 2½ per cent. on a gold basis. On the other hand, the companies in 1922 exported large quantities of valuable products held over from 1921 because of the heavy export taxes.

The Government believes the companies can well afford to supply at a sacrifice Roumania's oil requirements for the railways, marine, military, and navigation services, and also the needs of private industries; hence the imposition of maximum prices whereby the companies are obliged to deliver about 70 per cent. of their oil products at a fraction of their value for the benefit of the State and private industries. The companies take particular objection to making sacrifices to private industries, who would, indeed, prefer to pay reasonable prices for fuel in order to be sure of getting it. Benzine for the numerous motor-cars running in Bucharest is sold for only about a quarter its world value, at the expense of the industry.

Most of the small refiners have no production of their own, and are obliged to buy their crude oil from small producers without refineries. When the cost of crude oil and refining became more than the products realised on maximum prices with export quota proceeds, the small refiners shut down until the price of crude oil should fall, or the price of the export quota should increase, or the export tax be reduced to enable them to work at a profit. The producers on their side, showing that their drilling costs were very high, set out to prove that the price of the crude oil did not cover the expenditure and risk, and demanded higher maximum prices so that they might obtain a better price for it.

The Government insist that Roumania's needs be supplied at nominal prices, and the difference be obtained from the quota allowed for export. The Government, however, also tax the export with keen eyes on world prices, in order to leave the industry only what the Government consider a reasonable profit on capital invested.

This was the situation at the end of the year when the proposed new régime was published. Under the new scheme, whilst the maximum prices are increased especially to the private industries, and not specially to the State, the companies are obliged to break up the crude oil according to Government regulations, and no company can export unless evidence is given that its internal consumption quota has been provided. The regulations do not appear to provide for the several different qualities of oil from different fields, and otherwise the maximum prices still appear to show but little regard to the fact that whilst lei are received for the products, the material needed in the industry must be paid abroad in the equivalent of gold. Under the new régime, a kilogram of residuals must still be sold for the price of a kilogram of lignite. Also the application of the regulations soon created hardships, for permissions to export were delayed to those entitled thereto because of applications from those not entitled. The companies contend that the regulations regarding the treatment of crude oil are not in sympathy with its production and the country's requirements of specific products. Further, the regulations appear to leave the peddling of oil products to private consumers, free of all restrictions, so that whilst the refiners will only receive the maximum prices, there is nothing to govern the price at which the oil will eventually be peddled to the small consumers.

The Government is anxious to encourage drilling on the one hand, and on the other considers itself obliged to impose restrictions as a safeguard. In spite of the increased export tax, the new régime should prove more advantageous to the industry in 1923 than that which obtained all through 1922, so long as the leu remains heavily depreciated; but it still leaves the companies dissatisfied.

It will be evident from the foregoing that the complete liberty demanded by the companies is not likely to be obtained. In the meantime, the demands for fuel for internal consumption are naturally on the increase, and the State requirements are sometimes such that cisterns loaded with fuel oil and consigned to the refiners' customers are requisitioned by the authorities. There has not been enough fuel for factories, and Bucharest is sometimes threatened with a fuel famine, which might also mean a water famine, although water is in any case only obtainable for a few hours a day. The country is described as blessed with rich deposits of oil, gas, and coal, and yet has not sufficient fuel for its needs, and this is the result of maximum prices, which discourage drilling, and cause some of the fuel that exists to disappear, doubtless into the hands of speculators.

BRITISH CONSULAR REPORTS.

V.—CZECHO-SLOVAKIA.

The following extracts are taken from the report of Mr. Sydney P. Elliott, Acting Commercial Secretary at Prague, on the industrial and economic situation in Czecho-Slovakia as at March, 1923:—

The outstanding feature in the economic life of Czecho-Slovakia during the period from June, 1922, to March, 1923, has been the rise in the rate of exchange of the Czecho-Slovak crown. On July 1, 1922, the Czech crown stood at 10 centimes (or 229 per £) on the Zurich Exchange, but by August 24 it had risen to no less than 19.60 centimes (or 124 per £). The result of this abnormally rapid rise was to plunge the country into an economic crisis of the first magnitude. Exports fell off with alarming rapidity, stocks of raw materials and finished goods depreciated in value, costs of production automatically rose, and unemployment increased by leaps and bounds. A slight improvement set in in December, when the crown reacted to about 160 per £, at which figure it has since become more or less stabilised. Since the Czech currency first started its upward course after November, 1921, both industry and labour have made tremendous sacrifices in their endeavours to readjust prices to the new purchasing value of the crown abroad. During the intervening period wages have, on an average, been cut down 30 per cent. and prices of most manufactured articles have been reduced from 40 to 50 per cent. In view of the fact, however, that since November, 1921, the Czech crown has appreciated 260 per cent., whereas prices at the outside have fallen only on an average 50 per cent., it is obvious that costs of production to-day are still too high, and that if Czecho-Slovakia wishes to hold its export trade and to compete in the international markets at a profit, these must decline.

Problem for Manufacturers.

It is this problem with which manufacturers are confronted to-day, and it is one not easy of solution. Even should the crown remain stable at its present exchange, it is patent to all that wages and overhead charges must come down still further, but any more cuts in this direction must be accompanied by a corresponding fall in the cost of living. As, however, since January of this year the trend of wholesale prices has been upwards and the official statistics, too, show a slight increase in food prices since the beginning of the year, it would appear that, unless the Government comes to the assistance of industry, costs of production for the present had touched bottom. Two of the most important factors which militate against a further reduction in costs are the excessive coal tax and high freights, and manufacturers are pressing for a reduction in these items.

The official returns for the years 1920 and 1921 show that, expressed in values, the excess of exports over imports for the two years amounts to approximately 9 milliards of crowns. The correctness of these figures has been challenged both by prominent Czech and German industrials, and from an analysis of the figures it appears that, although the trade balances for the years in question were undoubtedly on the credit side, the active balance shown by the official figures did not completely correspond to the actual position. The fault probably arose from the method hitherto employed in arriving at the values of the different classes of goods exported and imported. Up to the end of 1922 the monetary values of the foreign trade have only been estimated, and it is natural that discrepancies have arisen between the computed value and the actual price at which manufacturers have sold their goods. From the beginning of the current year, however, a new method of compiling the foreign trade statistics has been introduced, and henceforth exporters will be compelled to declare the value of goods sold abroad, and, if necessary, to produce copies of invoices. The financial policy which the present Government has pursued since it took office has many critics amongst business men, and some regard it as a financial experiment upon which the whole economic life of the country is being hazarded. Whether the raising of the crown has or has not been carried too far will probably be proved in the course of the current year, but in the meantime there is no doubt that for some months past the Czech crown has been stabilised at a figure above its real economic value. Its value abroad is far higher than its purchasing power at home, and manufacturers have, as yet, been unable to readjust this discrepancy.

The Capital Levy.

The republic of Czecho-Slovakia was the first State which attempted to place its finances on a sound basis after the chaotic conditions prevailing after the war by introducing a capital levy. The results of the capital levy have proved extremely disappointing, and the measure itself has been a source of considerable embarrassment to the Government. The law is most complicated, and is not understood by the officials responsible for its administration. It has never been carried out to the letter, except in certain particular cases. Demands for the payment of capital levy have been made to those known or believed to be in a position to pay, but the actual sum to be paid has in most cases been the subject of negotiation between the Ministry of Finance and the individual concerned, and in almost every case the final assessment has always been far below that fixed by law. This levy has had a very detrimental effect upon industry and commerce, but owing to the slow and lenient manner in which the law has been applied it has not had the disastrous results which it otherwise would have had if it had been strictly enforced. It is highly probable that a very large proportion of the tax levied will never be paid.

Movement of Trade.

Since the formation of the republic there has been a remarkable redirection of trade to the West. Trade with Germany and Austria and the Succession States has fallen off, whilst that with countries with a high valuta has increased. This, however, may be regarded as only temporary, due to the present difficulties experienced by the Succession States in purchasing Czech goods with their inflated currencies. The Government fully realises that the future of Czecho-Slovak trade lies in Central Europe, and is framing its policy accordingly. Opinions differ as to what form this policy should take. Many advocate a Customs Union, but the rivalry existing between the several Succession States and the financial and economic problems which would have to be solved before an agreement could be effected render this difficult of accomplishment. In the meantime the Government, in its endeavour to cultivate the old traditional economic relations and interests so essential to the welfare of Central Europe, has concluded commercial treaties with most of the Succession States, and if it were possible to remove the fiscal walls which each State has built around itself by the conclusion of Customs conventions, the greatest obstacle to trade in Central Europe to-day would have been removed.

Trade with the United Kingdom.

During 1922 there was a noticeable falling off of trade with the United Kingdom, both in imports and exports, due, on the one hand, to a tightening up of the import restrictions as far as manufactured goods were concerned, and, on the other hand, to the high value of the crown, which rendered Czech prices uncompetitive. The exports to the United Kingdom amounted to 127,386 metric tons and 1,069,101 pieces, against 152,438 metric tons and 426,803 pieces in 1921; and imports from the United Kingdom totalled 48,490 metric tons and 13,253 pieces, against 97,692 metric tons and 1,040 pieces for the previous year. The chief Czech exports were:—Wood, coal, and peat, 39,950 metric tons; sugar, 19,912 metric tons; clothing, 1,069,067 pieces; glass and glass goods, 20,060 metric tons. The chief imports from the United Kingdom included:—Iron and ironware, 13,145 metric tons; woollen goods and yarns, 6,505 metric tons; wood, coal, and peat, 6,413 metric tons. The fact that Czecho-Slovakia itself manufactures for export many of the articles from the staple export commodities of the United Kingdom, and the policy which the Government in the past has adopted in protecting its own extensive industries to the exclusion of those produced abroad have made it extremely difficult for British manufacturers to extend their trade to this country. It is, however, hoped that the Commercial Treaty to be concluded between H.M. Government and the Republic of Czecho-Slovakia will remove many of the difficulties which have hitherto existed in developing trade with that country.

BRITISH ROUMANIAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

At the fifth annual meeting of the British Roumanian Chamber of Commerce Inc. on July 17 Viscount Goschen, chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts for the past year, referred to the considerable contraction during 1922 as compared with the two previous years, of the volume of business transacted between Great Britain and Roumania. He said that, according to the British Customs returns, the exports from Great Britain to Roumania during 1922 had declined to £2,633,000 (60,000 tons), the largest item being, as usual, cotton goods to the value of £1,500,000. The total figures for the two previous years were £5,800,000 for 1921 and £7,100,000 for 1920. Imports into Great Britain from Roumania for 1922 were valued at £1,700,000 (205,500 tons), the largest items being cereals £957,000 and oil £550,000. These figures also showed a reduction on a total of £3,400,000 for 1921, and £3,200,000 for 1920. The reduction in the figures for the total of goods exported from this country to Roumania was no doubt due to a large extent to the fact that considerable stocks were held in Roumania at the beginning of last year, and that at the present time it was believed that the merchants' stocks were very much depleted.

The recent law passed in Roumania for the prolongation of the payment of debts due by Roumanian merchants to exporters from this country, if the settlement was considered satisfactory by the merchants here, and also in view of the fact that stocks were so low in Roumania, might result in bigger figures for this year than for the period under review. He believed that whatever business there was at the present time was being conducted on a more healthy basis than some of the business that had been concluded during the years 1920 and 1921. Roumania, he pointed out, was an important customer for this country, and with an improvement in general world conditions, which might reasonably be hoped for in the near future, the prospects for business might be brighter. Recent legislation in Roumania affecting the oil industry should result in the attraction of more foreign capital into that industry, and it was to be expected that the overdue development of Roumanian oil potentialities might now be realised.

M. Titulesco, Roumanian Minister in London, was unanimously re-elected honorary president of the Chamber, and Viscount Goschen vice-president. The following were re-elected members of the Council for the ensuing year:—Messrs. E. T. Agius, John F. Cleeves, H. Ernest Crawley, Sir Edward Manville, M.P., Sir S. F. Mendl, K.B.E., Mr. Percy Quilter, and Mr. Robert Rowell.

It was reported that the Council of the Chamber, at its meeting that day, had resolved to make representations in the proper quarter with a view to the restoration of the use of cable codes for telegrams to Roumania.

YUGOSLAV RAILWAY REGULATIONS.

The British Commercial Secretary at Belgrade states that, in accordance with a decision of the Ministry of Communications, railway booking clerks may not demand that foreign travellers pay for ticket and other railway charges in their own (foreign) currency. If, however, the passengers so wish, the booking clerks are obliged to accept foreign currencies, but only those which are "healthier" (less depreciated) than the dinar. Change will not be given in foreign currency, but in dinars. He further states that the Minister of Communications, in conjunction with the Minister of Finance, will prescribe official rates of exchange at which foreign currencies will be accepted in payment for passenger tickets and the carriage of goods and baggage.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

SHIPPING AT THE PIRÆUS.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

Athens.

The total number of steamers which entered the port of Piræus during June was 572. Of these, 470 were Greek, 47 Italian, 20 British, 7 Roumanian, 6 French, 6 American, 6 German, 3 Dutch, 2 Russian, 2 Swedish, 1 Belgian, and 1 Bulgarian. The number of sailing vessels which entered the port during the same period was 638, of which 11 were Italian and 1 French.

The receipts of the Piræus Customs amounted to 12,929,000 drachmæ during the month of June, as against 14,918,000 drachmæ collected during the corresponding month last year. The decrease of about two million drachmæ is due to the appreciation of the drachma, seeing that duty is always paid on a gold basis.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS

Hamadan, June 6.

The general market situation shows no signs of improvement. Wheat prices have fallen from 20 per cent. to 25 per cent., as an excellent harvest is assured. Important purchases of opium are now being made at prices varying between 8,700 krans and 9,000 krans per case containing 910 kilos.

Cyprus, June 2.

The market is very dull. The prospects of the coming crop are good. There is no demand from abroad for cereals. A shipment is anticipated for the middle of June.

Cyprus, June 9.

Small sales of wool and cumin seed have taken place in Marseilles. There is a noticeable decrease in imports, particularly from Germany.

Cyprus, June 16.

There is a slightly better tone in the market. Imports continue to decline, whereas exportation is on the increase.

Mosul, June 16.

The wool market is very active. The price of the batman of 13½ kilos reaches Rs.12.8.

Jerusalem, June 9.

Barley and wheat of the new crop are beginning to be sold on the market. Owing to the good results of the wheat crop prices are going down. On the other hand, the price of barley is maintained, the quantities offered being of small importance.

Jerusalem, June 16.

The prices of cereals are continuing to fall. Other markets are quiet.

Nablus, June 9.

The market remains quiet. The sale of Nablus soap on the Egyptian market has been insignificant this week, and prices have tended to weaken.

Nablus, June 16.

The price of Nablus soap in Egypt has undergone a new fall this week. The kantar is sold at Ps.310 to Ps.290, according to the quality, as against Ps.320 and Ps.300 the previous week. Even with this fall there have been no important sales. The cereal harvest continues under favourable conditions. Everything points to a good yield.

Haifa, June 16.

The grain market remains firm. Trade in manufactures has been active, but the export trade has been paralysed this week by the fluctuations in the exchange on France and Italy.

Haifa, June 23.

The grain market is quiet. The export trade is at a standstill owing to the fall in the exchange on France and Italy.

Jaffa, June 9.

This season's melon crop is estimated at about four times that of last year. Shipments to Egypt have now commenced.

Jaffa, June 23.

The state of the local markets is unchanged. A small quantity of lupins has been shipped to Marseilles.

Anglo-Egyptian oil output for the week ended July 20:—Gemsah, 12 tons (previous week 11 tons); Hurghada, 3,367 tons (against 3,305 tons).

The half-yearly general meeting of the Smyrna-Aidin Railway will be held at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, on September 25.

EGYPTIAN MARKETS.

Futures Dull and Weak.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ended July 13, state:—Since our last report, the futures market has been rather dull and closed weak. The demand from abroad has been poor, and the New York market has been this week rather quiet. Very few transactions have taken place in our market, and what was done consisted almost exclusively of straddles between old and new crop positions. At the second tender of July Sakellarides a further 12,000 kantars were delivered and were absorbed very easily despite the fact that the premium of November over July has now dropped to about 150 points, whereas a few days ago it was about 200 points. Ashmounis have kept fairly strong and have again substantially appreciated in comparison to Sakellarides. The justification of this must be found in the fact that the available Ashmouni supplies are negligible, whereas Sakellarides tenderable cotton is still in ample supply on the market. There is nothing of note to say about Egyptian in Liverpool, which continues to be the cheaper market of the two and, as such, attracts most of the present trade demand. Stocks in Liverpool are now almost equal to those at the same period last year. This week's receipts amounted to 7,831 krs., and the total since September 1 now stands at 6,627,779 krs. Exports have this week amounted to 68,981 krs., and the stock now stands at 1,178,490 krs., against 1,239,640 krs. a week ago and 1,772,838 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—We have had a quiet week at Minet-el-Bassal, and sales amount to about 4,500 B/s, of which we estimate B/s 3,050 Sakellarides, B/s 1,400 Uppers, and 50 B/s Various. With July contracts depressed owing to fear of dockets we have now a most unusual position, with Good Fair and Fully Good Fair spot at over the price of the contract, and Fully Fair at only 1/4 dollar below. In Uppers only Fair and below are quoted at below the price of August contracts. Cotton below Fully Good Fair in all growths continues extremely scarce, and holders are not ready sellers.

Sakellarides.—All styles have been dealt in with the grades above Fully Good Fair in most request. Prices of spot against contracts are generally considerably dearer than last week.

Uppers.—As in Sakellarides all styles have changed hands with most of the business in the better grades. Prices of spot against contracts are considerably dearer than last week.

Brown and White.—A small business has been done at hardening rates.

Crop 1923.—The plant is progressing normally everywhere. The leaf worm attack is reported to be rather light. The report of the Ministry of Agriculture on the condition of the crop for the month of June reads as follows: "The heat and the fine weather have resulted in an improvement of the plant since the previous month, but the growth in the majority of the districts is still irregular, and the development remains backward. The prospects of the crop in Upper Egypt are more favourable than in Lower Egypt. Water has everywhere been ample. Flowering is general, and the formation of the bolls is advancing in the early-sown fields. There have been numerous attacks of cotton worm, but they are as a whole benignant, and damage has been insignificant. Light attacks of 'wilt' are also reported in parts of Lower Egypt and in Minia. The bersim worm and aphis have also made their appearance, but no danger is anticipated. On the whole, the condition of the crop has improved slightly during the month, but apart from certain districts, the plants are still late."

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Inquiry Falling Off.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended July 18:—

The inquiry has not been so good this week, and an easier tendency has again been apparent, particularly in the Sakel market, which has attracted more attention. Fully Good Fair cotton, at about "100 to 125 on," continues to hold the field, which is not to be wondered at with futures in the neighbourhood of 14½d. per lb. More business has been done in Good Sakellaridis again, and visitors from Egypt are astonished at the low prices obtainable here for this cotton. Nevertheless, the inquiry, as we have several times insisted lately, is gradually working up to the better grades, and on one day this week quite a landmark was established when, after a very long interval, "good" Sakel was grouped with the lower qualities (in the daily official quotations) and left unchanged, when Fine and Extra Fine Sakel were reduced 10 points. Upper cotton has rather lost ground again, the relative attractiveness of Sakellaridis quite putting it in the shade for the time being.

Fair Sakellaridis, about 14.00d., has been in good request with a limited selection. Low cotton seems to be steadily losing ground, and we should advise holders to revise limits and "get out" before the end of the season. Brown cotton has been neglected. A persistent inquiry for White Sudan has been in evidence, but does not seem to have extended to actual business, which has been very quiet in all Sudan growths. Crop news continues to be favourable.

Forwardings to spinners, for the week ending 13th inst., were returned as 6,431 bales. A further slight decrease in the Liverpool stock is noticeable. Total sales 4,200 (includes 100 bales Sudan). Quotations of Sakellaridis are reduced 10 points for Fair to F.G.F.; 20 points for Good, and 45 points for Fair and Extra Fine. Brown cotton is reduced 20 points, with F.G.F. and Good exceptionally 40 points lower. Upper is 20 points lower all round. F.G. Fair Sakel to-day, 15.65d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

No Improvement in Business.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended July 21 states:—

The state of affairs in this market during the past week shows no change from that recently prevailing, and, in fact, it does not appear likely that there can be any improvement until doubts are set at rest with regard to the extent and quality of the growing crop. As has been before pointed out, it is useless to expect any pronounced activity on the part of buyers, whilst there is such a considerable difference between the prices quoted for raw cotton from old and new crops.

Yarn.—The Federation of Master Cotton Spinners has decided that the basic price scheme which it inaugurated on June 1 last shall be abandoned, since, as previously reported, it was being ignored by most spinners, who found that they could not obtain the minimum prices quoted. The state of things in the section of the industry which spins American cotton could hardly be worse. Prices are very weak notwithstanding the steadiness of the raw material, and there is considerable pressure to sell. The Egyptian section, whilst not so busily engaged as recently, is still in quite a fair position.

Cloth.—There is said to have been a larger inquiry but no improvement in the actual business done. Demand from China has fallen off, and there is nothing particularly good to be said regarding any market. Transactions continue to be mostly in small lots to satisfy immediate requirements.

Raw Cotton.—Prices show little change on the week. Imports and "spot" demand in Liverpool both continue on the small side. Reports from the United States and Egypt with regard to the growing crop have in both cases been of a favourable character. Closing prices are as follows:—American Fully Middling, 15.64; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 15.65.

The quantity of gold extracted from the mines in India during April amounted to 35,544 ounces, valued at Rs.21,32,394.

Company Meeting.

BANK OF ROUMANIA.

Satisfactory Harvest Outlook.

The ordinary annual general meeting of the Bank of Roumania, Limited, was held on July 18 at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C. The Viscount Goschen, C.B.E., presided.

The Secretary (Mr. H. Locke) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman said:—Gentlemen, in rising to move the adoption of the report and the accounts for the year ending December 31, 1922, I assume that you will take the report and balance-sheet as read. The shareholders will, I have no doubt, be satisfied with the figures presented in the balance-sheet. As you will see, the balance available after making provision for bad and doubtful debts, income tax, corporation tax, and exchange depreciation in the bank's funds employed in Roumania, amounts to £16,437 7s. 6d. The board recommends the payment of a dividend of 6s. per share, less income tax, which will absorb £11,062 10s., and that the balance of £5,374 17s. 6d. be transferred to the contingency account. In comparison with the total figures for the year 1921, there is a reduction of a little over £250,000. This is accounted for by the fact that the conversion into sterling of the Bucharest accounts has been made at 800 lei to the £ sterling, as against 550 for the previous year, although the currency figures in themselves show a slight increase.

The business of the bank continues to be satisfactory. The working expenses, however, are heavy, occasioned by the high cost of living, etc., in Roumania, and the high rate of exchange at which we have to convert our profits on the other side reflects unfavourably on our profits in sterling. There was during the year 1922 a depreciation in the leu from 550 to 800 to the £, and the Government took steps to regulate dealings in exchange, and the National Bank of Roumania has also lent support recently to improve the exchange position. The exchange rate has of late been much steadier. Your board has again to report that the conservative policy to which I made reference last year has been continued. By increased and extended taxation, Roumania is making a very serious effort to reach equilibrium in its budget. Not unnaturally many of these taxes, in the state of development in which Roumania finds itself, are in the nature of experiments and do not all fully achieve their object. It is worthy of note that the Government has ceased to have recourse to the National Bank for borrowing for its own purposes, although the needs of the commerce of the country resulted in an increase in the note circulation of the National Bank from 13,722 millions of lei on January 1 to 15,997 millions of lei on December 31.

The Roumanian Government, after a careful review of the position of the oil industry, have recently modified the conditions of export and also internal distribution, and this step will assist those engaged in that important industry. With regard to the harvest, on which so much of Roumania's prosperity depends, while there is little increase in the area under cultivation, the condition of the crops at present warrants expectations that the production will exceed that for last year. Our Bucharest manager, in a telegram just received, informs me that recent rain has had a very beneficial effect on the barley, oats, and maize, and the prospects at the moment are for a good and abundant crop, provided there is a little more rain within the next three or four weeks. Some damage was done by recent hailstorms.

With regard to the export trade from Roumania, very much depends on the railway services for transport, and, although progress has been made within the year under review, railway facilities are still far behind requirements. This matter, the importance of which is fully recognised by the authorities, is now, I understand, occupying very serious attention on the part of the Roumanian Government. Before resuming my seat I desire on behalf of the board to thank the managers and staffs both here and in Roumania for their loyal co-operation in carrying out the affairs of the bank.

I now move: "That the report and balance-sheet now read be received and adopted, that the sum of £5,374 17s. 6d. be placed to the credit of the contingency account, that the dividend for the year ended December 31, 1922, be fixed at 6s. per share, less income tax, and that this dividend be paid on and after July 24, 1923." Before putting the resolution I should like to inquire if any shareholder desires to ask any question.

General the Hon. Sir H. A. Lawrence, K.C.B., seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. E. W. H. Barry proposed that the retiring director (Viscount Goschen) be re-elected. Lieut.-Colonel Sir Albert Stern, K.B.E., C.M.G., seconded the resolution, which was unanimously approved.

On the motion of Mr. J. W. Hoskins, seconded by Mr. H. Smethurst, the auditors (Messrs. Jackson, Pixley and Co.) were re-appointed.

Mr. Roselli then moved that a vote of thanks be accorded to the chairman, the directors, management, and staff for their services during the past year. Mr. E. C. Barter seconded the resolution, which was unanimously approved.

The Chairman briefly acknowledged the compliment, and the proceedings terminated.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Egyptian Delta Light Railways.

The gross receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways for the year ended March 31, totalled £343,792. The working expenses totalled £259,716, compared with £296,986 for the previous year. This reduction is principally due to the decreased cost of fuel. The construction of the extension from Sah-el-Hagar to Foua is rapidly progressing, and it is anticipated will be completed and opened during October, 1923. The first instalment, amounting to £E37,000 of £E90,000, the balance of the purchase price of the Cairo Helouan Railway, was paid over to the company by the Government on June 6. Application will be made for further instalments to be paid as the work of construction of the line progresses. The Egyptian Government has agreed to refund to the company in three annual instalments their participation in the interest on investments, etc., received from the company during the four years ended March 31, 1921. The second annual instalment of £9,102 has been taken credit for and is shown as a deduction from the Government's proportion of profits in the net revenue account. The balance carried to the net revenue account is £84,075, plus interest £7,156 and balance brought forward of £61,650, making £152,882. After providing for interest on Debentures and for all fixed charges, and making provision for the proportion of profits due to the Egyptian Government, £103,230 remains. The board recommend a dividend of 4 per cent. on the Preference shares for the year, leaving £61,599 to be carried forward. Meeting, Winchester House, July 27, noon.

Lake Copais Co.

The report for 1922 states that the net profit in Greece for the year was £9,627. The profit in drachmæ was very much in excess of that of the previous year, but the result in sterling was seriously affected by the heavy depreciation in exchange. The directors recommend the distribution at the full rate of 5 per cent. (less tax) on the "A" Debenture stock in fully-paid 5 per cent. "A" Debenture stock at par, in accordance with the scheme approved by the stockholders. The capital expenditure during year amounted to £8,919, the principal items being the purchase of land, including that upon which the company's light railway runs from its main stores to the Athens-Larissa Railway. Meeting, Winchester House, July 27, 2.30 p.m.

Eastern Telegraph.

The revenue of the Eastern Telegraph Company for 1922 amounted to £3,489,071, less £1,653,838 for ordinary expenses, and £540,256 for maintenance of cables, income taxes payable abroad, and special payments and temporary allowances to staff, leaving £1,294,976. After providing for income and corporation taxes and final adjustment of excess profits duty, interest on loan from Eastern and South African Telegraph Company, interest on Mortgage Debenture stock, and dividends on preference stock there remains £847,249, plus £568,008 brought in, making £1,415,257. The directors have placed £400,000 to general reserve. A final dividend of 2½ per cent. is recommended, making 10 per cent., free of tax, for year, leaving £515,257 to be carried forward.

Eastern Extension Telegraph.

The gross revenue of the Eastern Extension Australasia and China Telegraph Company for 1922 amounted to £2,061,540, from which is deducted £755,440 for ordinary expenses and £319,938 for maintenance of cables and special expenditure, leaving £986,165. After providing £231,266 for income tax and corporation tax, and £30,096 for interest on Mortgage Debenture stock, there remains £724,802, plus £307,880 brought forward, making £1,032,682. The directors have transferred £250,000 to general reserve. Four dividends, making 10 per cent., free of tax, have been paid, leaving £382,682 to be carried forward.

Bank of Roumania.

The report of the Bank of Roumania for 1922 states that after making provision for bad and doubtful debts, income tax, corporation tax, etc., placing £2,000 to pension fund, and providing for exchange depreciation in the bank's funds employed in Roumania, the amount available is £16,437 7s. 6d. The directors recommend a dividend of 6s. per share (less tax), absorbing £11,062 10s. 0d., and carrying the balance of £5,374 17s. 6d. to credit of the contingency account. The accounts from Bucharest have been converted into sterling at the rate current on December 31 last.

Furness, Withy.

The report of the directors of Furness, Withy and Co., Ltd., for the year ended April 30, states that the profits, after providing for taxation and including the balance brought forward, amount to £758,565 12s. 11d. The year has again been one of serious depression in the shipping industry and, as was the case last year, the board has had to rely mainly for profits upon other branches of the company's business, and dividends on investments. The usual half-yearly dividends on the preference shares were paid on November 1, 1922, and May 1, 1923, and on the same dates dividends were paid on the ordinary shares at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, free of income tax. The directors recommend the payment of a bonus of 2½ per cent., free of income tax, on the Ordinary shares for the past twelve months, which will represent a total dividend for the year of 7½ per cent., free of income tax. They have also transferred a sum of £200,000 to depreciation account, leaving a balance of £202,315 12s. 11d. to carry forward to next year's account. The bonus will be paid to all shareholders registered on the books of the company on July 26, and the warrants will be posted on August 13. In respect to the current financial year, the warrants for the half-yearly dividends on the ordinary and preference shares will be posted on October 31. Meeting: Furness House, Leadenhall Street, E.C., to-day, noon

Oilfields of Egypt.

The report of the Oilfields of Egypt for the year ended March 31 states that of the amount outstanding on call account at March 31, 1922, £18,389 was collected during year, and 11,811 shares were forfeited for non-payment of calls, the amount received on forfeited shares account being increased by £3,052. The balance of £4,264 outstanding is considered to be good, and every effort is being made to collect same. Well No. 2, Ras Dhib, was drilled to 1,910 ft., traces of gas and oil being met with; from that depth down to 2,026 ft. no traces of gas or oil were encountered, and it was therefore decided to cease drilling after consultation with the Mines Controller and the representative of the Geological Survey Department of the Egyptian Government, who concurred in the view of the company's technical advisers that the possibilities of deep oil were remote. As regards Ras Bahar, funds are not available for carrying the well to necessary depth, nor has it been found possible to raise further money for the purpose, in view of the fact that a number of companies have lately ceased operations in Egypt after having expended much capital in an endeavour, without success, to find oil in commercial quantities.

The directors have had laid before them particulars of a large oil concession in Venezuela, and are now looking into the business. The cost of examination and report thereon would be defrayed from the company's funds. Should the report prove favourable, it is proposed that this company should (with a view to operate the concession) promote a subsidiary company in which as vendor this company would have a substantial interest. Meeting, Winchester House, August 1, noon.

The Third International Samples Fair will be held at Zagreb from April 27 to May 5, 1924.

DUNLOP TYRES AND FOREIGN COMPETITION.

Speaking at a luncheon given at the works of the Dunlop Rubber Company at Birmingham on July 23 to celebrate the thirty-fifth anniversary of the grant of the first Dunlop pneumatic tyre patent, Sir Eric Geddes, chairman of the company, said that their publicity made a special feature of British tyres for British cars, and for every other car in Great Britain, and they hoped in Ireland. Approximately, 95 per cent. of British cars standardised Dunlop tyres to-day. He honestly believed that there was no tyre to-day equal to the Dunlop best, just as there was no golf ball to-day equal to the "Maxfli," which was also Dunlop's best. Owing to the tariff arrangements of other countries they had been forced to manufacture abroad, in France, Germany and America, apart altogether from the Dunlop factories in the Dominions and Japan, but America with her enormous production, and the Continent (Germany, France and Italy) with their depreciated exchanges and no tariff on tyres into this country as there was on motor-cars, could, with the low wages paid, and low taxation compared to their burdens, put tyres into this country cheaper than the British tyre manufacturers could make them, and with every drop in exchange that position became more accentuated. It followed that the company could, in fact, import tyres to this country from their French and German factories, and make more money than they could upon the same tyre manufactured in Birmingham, and this in spite of the greater efficiency of the Birmingham worker. Needless to say, they did not do so. Every tyre sold in this country by them was British built, but there were markets in Europe and elsewhere where they were absolutely cut out from supplying, as they used to supply from Birmingham, because of the exchange difficulty and tariffs against them. Was it too much to ask that the British motorist should be asked to insist upon having British-made tyres, unless he was satisfied for himself that he could not get as good value for his money as he could for foreign tyres? That was all that the British tyre manufacturers asked of him.

ROUMANIAN SECURITIES.

In the House of Commons on July 18 Brigadier-General Spears asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs it he would consider discussing with the Roumanian financial delegation the taking by the Roumanian Government of such measures as would tend to re-establish the confidence of the British public in Roumanian securities.

Mr. McNeill: The Roumanian Finance Minister has now left this country, but during his visit to London his attention was drawn to the importance of taking steps to improve Roumanian credit in the eyes of the British public.

The production of the Dacia Romano Company for June amounted to 956.70 tons.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Treaty of Lausanne.

Active rejoicing over the conclusion of peace at Lausanne has been confined to Turkey. Of the Great Powers none, the Turks may rest assured, resents their success in the council chamber. If the plans of the Allies in the early stages of the Conference did not conform with the final draft of the Treaty, it was not because they wished to restrict the national liberty of the Turks in any way, but because they desired, in the interests of Turkey, to see that liberty developing on lines that would give the Turkish people the maximum benefit. The Angora Government had other views; it was resolved to be the sole arbiter of Turkey's destiny in every detail, and the present Treaty is the result. For the Allies, however, there are very practical advantages in the Treaty even as it stands. Apart from the re-establishment of the moral equation in the Near East, Great Britain will be able to withdraw her forces from Turkey and to reduce the garrisons in Irak and Palestine. Although much of the agitation in India over the Turkish question was prompted by political considerations, there can be little doubt that British prestige throughout the East has suffered from the bad handling of that question. In all reputable quarters the Treaty will have removed the former misgivings, and British-Indian relations can hardly fail to benefit.

The Aga Khan's Message.

A striking and statesmanlike lead to the Moslems of India has been given by the Aga Khan, and it is to be hoped that his Highness's message will receive all the closer attention, because during the last few years he has been inclined to identify himself with the misgivings felt by the rank and file of his co-religionists over the supposed British attitude towards the Turks. Writing from Lausanne, the Aga Khan emphasises the fact that for the first time in history a Treaty has been signed on behalf of a Mohammedan nation upon absolutely equal terms with the Great Powers of the West. The settlement is "highly satisfactory," and the freedom obtained by the Turkish National State is complete. The Turks owe this settlement, the Aga Khan continues, to their own sacrifices, courage, and fortitude, but they owe it also "to the good will of the peoples of Great Britain and France." To Moslems in India and in other parts of the British Empire or in mandated territories he declares it to be his belief that the leading statesmen of Turkey now sincerely wish to be on good terms with Great Britain as well as with France, and he warns them that nothing should be done to embitter the new relations now beginning between Great Britain and Turkey. The message adds: "Instead of the Khalifate movement, which is out of date and can serve no useful purpose, the Mohammedans of India ought to try to help Turkey to bind her wounds and to recover her lost prosperity. The best advice I can give to all Moslems, both in India and elsewhere, is to do their utmost to assist this new national Mohammedan State in its hour of need. This can best be done, not by talking politics, but by taking practical steps. . . . Turkey is on the threshold of a new era. Her leaders do not want us to make more bad blood between her and the Western Powers. Let us, therefore, leave politics alone, and turn ourselves to the task of offering such help as we can to the new State, which will assuredly become the brightest star in Islam." Eminently sound advice, as well as instructive in its admissions.

Greeks and Armenians in Turkey.

There is practical common sense in the plea put forward by some of the Armenians themselves to be spared further interference by the Western Powers in the relations between Turks and Armenians. A dignified appeal was made to the Turkish Delegation at the Lausanne Conference that the non-Moslem races of Turkey should henceforth receive satisfactory treatment, and there for the present the matter should end, until the Turks have had time to show their intentions towards these peoples. The intervention of the Powers has invariably compromised the position of the Armenians in Turkey, and, if repeated at this juncture, may well have the same effect. On the other hand, our Constantinople correspondence during recent months has made reference to a rapprochement between Armenians and Turks, and it is at least a possible development that the Turks, when they realise that the safety and integrity of Turkey are no longer threatened by the intrigues of their subject races, will adopt a humaner and more sensible attitude towards these. If the Greeks left in Turkey can also reassure the powers that be that they too have accepted the logic of events, and, having done with political aspirations aiming at the subversion of the Turkish State, intend to devote their energies to their own material well-being, which involves the corresponding progress of Turkey, they will not only fare better themselves, but may also hasten the day when Turkish prejudices against the presence of Greeks in Asia Minor will be abandoned.

Greece and the Treaty.

The sympathy that will be widely felt for Greece at this time will be accompanied by the reassuring reflection that the conclusion of the Lausanne Treaty leaves her free at last to devote all her attention and energies to the task of putting her house in order. Demobilisation of the army has begun, and a General Election is promised for October. M. Zaimis, Greece's "safe man," has been offered the leadership of a new political group comprising the more moderate elements of both the Venizelist and the anti-Venizelist parties, and is to give his reply to the offer this week. This movement is at least an earnest of the Revolutionary Committee's desire to fulfil the conditions which Great Britain has made indispensable to the resumption of diplomatic relations—that free expression should be given to the wishes of the people, and that the domination of Greek politics by the Committee should be terminated. M. Zaimis' acceptance would probably imply that he was satisfied with the genuineness of the Committee's intentions. Greece, it is to be feared, however, has a long way to go before all the political bitternesses aroused during the last few years are finally laid to rest. Yet it will be only when they are that she can resume her onward march of material progress.

The Problem of Hungary.

It would be a great mistake to imagine that the debate on Hungarian Reparations in the House of Lords was prompted by memories of Magyar hunting-boxes and of the pleasant manners of the Magyar nobility. We prefer to read into it a genuine desire to clear up a definite portion of the mess that the War has left behind in Europe. Because France has embarked on a certain line of policy in regard to Germany, there is no reason why a number of minor countries should be allowed to perpetuate mischief in another part of the Continent. Unfortunately, French action has hitherto paralysed the moral strength of the Entente, with the result that Balkan and Central European affairs have been left largely to their own devices, and that part of the Continent suffers accordingly. Now that Great Britain has seen fit to recover her liberty of action in regard to German Reparations she may as well extend the salutary process by resuming her position as friend, philosopher, and guide to the Balkan States. There should be no need to act upon the suggestion that monetary assistance should be withheld until each State showed a measure of reasonableness. A greater display of interest in Balkan affairs and closer attention to their problems would quickly rehabilitate Great Britain as a valued mentor in that part of the world.

The Little Entente and France.

France may have a sound case for her policy towards Germany; but there can be no excuse for extending the same treatment to a minor State, such as Hungary now is. The Governments of the Little Entente will do well to ponder the weighty words uttered by Lord Curzon in replying to the questions put to the Government in the House of Lords on the subject of Hungarian Reparations, and they should compare the constructive policy in regard to Central and South-Eastern Europe for which Great Britain stands with the purely negative policy championed by the French Government. Hungary's behaviour may not be entirely above reproach, but a sense of proportion is required, even if more generous sentiments are unattainable. The harm that Hungary can do her neighbours by entertaining sinister designs upon them is negligible; the consequences of her financial collapse would be serious and widespread. In these circumstances how can the Governments of the Little Entente expect Great Britain to share their alarm because one more Magyar confesses himself an unrepentant Monarchist? Yet they meet with sympathy for their nervousness in Paris, and are encouraged in a policy which can only continue indefinitely the curse of depreciated currencies.

Egypt and the Hejaz.

It is to be hoped that Egypt enters upon her new era of independence equipped with a sense of humour. If she does, she will be the first to admit that King Hussein is "one up" in the encounter now on the tapis. Undeterred by the loss of the £8,000 subsidy, and by the return of the Egyptian official pilgrimage with the Holy Carpet, the King of the Hejaz has secured a carpet of his own ordering, has had it conveyed with great ceremony to Mecca, and the pilgrimage has proceeded according to plan. With this new carpet, or black brocade veil, the Ka'aba in Mecca will now be covered for the next ten or eleven months, and there will be time for the quarrel between the Hejaz and Egypt to be amicably adjusted. It is not in the interests of Islam that there should be any serious controversy at this time involving the Holy City. The disputants may be tempted to gain support for their respective views outside their own countries, and there will be a danger of the Moslem world being divided at a moment when it is essential that each State should be looking after its own affairs, and not indulging in quarrels abroad.

The Week in India.

The past week brought an unusually copious supply of news affecting India, and much of it was good, but a few items were rather disquieting. The best news is that the monsoon has become really vigorous. As so often happens, July has falsified the fears of June, and we can look forward hopefully, though, of course, not confidently, to August and September. In political regions the influence of Lausanne is already beginning to appear, and it is quite probable that His Highness the Aga Khan's appeal to Indian Moslems to drop the Khalifate movement, to which reference has been made above, will be effective, not so much because it is eminently reasonable, as that it comes at a moment when many Indians are seeking an excuse for evacuating a position which has become untenable. In this connection it is satisfactory to see that the Eed celebrations have apparently passed off without serious disturbances, except in one locality, though we fear the result is due more to the efficiency of the police administration than to any relaxation of the tension between the different communities. Finally, we may note that the Legislative Assembly has been in one of its good moods for most of the week, and has done a reasonable quantity of useful work.

India and Kenya.

One of the disquieting features to which we have referred is the intransigent attitude of Indian politicians towards the Cabinet's decision on the vexed question of Kenya. The question itself lies outside the orbit of this journal, but, looking at its purely Indian side, it appears to us that the decision offers to Indian settlers adequate protection in practice against the real dangers which at one time threatened them, and we think it would have been the wisest course to put facts before feelings, and see how the settlement works out; but, however that may be, we can find no possible justification for launching a campaign of ineffective protest. As an instance of sheer futility, we may take the proposal that India should withdraw from the Empire Exhibition. Indian support for the exhibition has come from people with things to sell, who consider it an excellent chance of enlarging the market for their wares. If India should refuse to participate, the exhibition might possibly lose a little, but Indian industry would lose a great deal. Possibly when the politicians who make such proposals have had time for reflection they will recall the Indian tradition that, in a family jar, you cut off the nose of the offender, not the nose of some third party, and still less your own.

The Sikh Ferment.

The other disquieting item in the Indian news is the apparent determination of the malcontent Sikhs to force an open conflict with the Punjab Government on questions which can by no possible ingenuity be represented as religious. There is probably much truth in the view, which is now apparently gaining ground in Simla, that at the back of this agitation lies the fear of a strong but slow-witted people that they may fall under the domination of the quicker intellects of other parts of India. One may sympathise with the aspirations to be masters at home, but surely the methods which are being adopted are the stupidest it is possible to conceive. The balance of forces in the Punjab is such that the Sikhs could reasonably hope to dominate the administration, and their obvious interest is to make the Provincial Government so strong that it can stand up to the "Madras lawyers" and "Bombay moneylenders," whom they dread. As a matter of fact, they are doing their utmost to paralyse their Government, and they will have only themselves to thank if the interests of India should compel the Central Administration to take them actively in hand.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

The Naval Air Service.

The old controversy between the Admiralty and the Air Ministry as to the position and status of the Naval Air Service has again broken out, and this time more virulently than ever. The Navy, of course, wants its branch of the Air Service under its own control; it wants its men to be naval from start to finish—a naval airman, that is, should be first and last a sailor, so that when he leaves the air he can return to the sea. Against this view the Committee of Imperial Defence have decided that the Air Service, including the Naval Air Service, should be under one control—that of the Air Ministry.

Most extraordinary rumours have been travelling about over the matter, such as the threat of resignation by the Sea Lords if the Admiralty does not get its way. But this and other similar things may be dismissed as nonsense or bluff. Yet beneath all the pettiness and jealousies to which the occasion has given rise, there is a very real and serious divergence of opinion—a divergence on which the layman dearly loves, but is really incompetent, to pronounce. We learned in the War how difficult the matter of control could prove, and our land and sea and air forces are now so much members one of another that complete self-control on the part of one inevitably affects adversely the others. One suspects that high tradition and consideration of prestige may be counting for a little too much in this question.

In any case, we shall soon know, for Mr. Baldwin is expected to make a statement on it to-morrow. Most people are taking it for granted that the Admiralty will get its own way.

Parliamentary Propaganda.

During the War we fell into the vile state of mind in which truth did not take place as a high virtue; in other words, we tolerated propaganda. As soon as the War was over most of us dropped that attitude, and, indeed, came wearily to suspect the accuracy of anything "official." The Government, too, we hoped, was dispensing with the method known as "doping the Press," which in Mr. Lloyd George's balmy days, was raised to a fine art; but last week our complacency was very rudely disturbed when we had foisted upon us the most flagrant of "puffs" of the Postmaster-General, Sir L. Worthington-Evans. Sir Laming Worthington-Evans promptly denied knowledge of the origin of the "puff," but the publication of it has done him no good.

There can be no doubt that the publicity sections of all Government Departments should be destroyed, for the practice of "boosting" special persons or things is not only extremely repulsive, but perfectly ineffective now—we provisionally assume the valuelessness of a statement manifestly issued from a Government Department (manifestly, because none of them can conceal their exquisite style). Publicity agents are everywhere the devil; puffed officials are either unscrupulous or insufficiently acquainted with the work of their underlings; and, in view of the wide recognition of these facts, the fumigation of the departments has become a matter of urgent necessity to our pride and self-respect.

The Penny Post

It would seem that Government officials have recently been vying with each other in pessimistic passages. We hear, first, that trade is bad and is going to be worse, and that unemployment will increase, and now, a few days ago, we have from the Postmaster-General a gloomy account of his department. He had to admit that he had made a profit of five and a-half millions, but, even so, would give no hope of a return to the penny post. His argument seemed to rest on the fact that his business increased only by 12 per cent. after the postage was reduced from 2d. to 1½d. But if only he knew how we long for that penny post again! Three-halfpence is a chilly, unromantic sum; naturally, no one wants to write letters which conclude with so deliberate and mathematical an act as sticking on a three-halfpenny stamp. We are well rid of the worry and calculations (and loss of temper consequent on the absence of half-pennies) that the omnibuses used to put us to with their three-halfpenny fares; and no one has heard of any financial hardships accruing to the bus companies. Sentiment and utility are alike on the side of the penny post, and no doubt some day the State will warily follow where the private firms have already trodden.

The Legend of Blackheath.

A most remarkable thing happened last week which will interest cricketers the world over: Surrey beat Kent at Blackheath. No sportsman, and particularly no cricketer, disbelieves in the existence of luck; some grounds are always good for him, some always bad. And if there ever was a ground the properties of which could not, in the eyes of both Kent and Surrey men, possibly change, it was Blackheath. The last time that Kent lost there was in 1897—far too long ago for any member of either of the present teams to remember. But right from the start of this game one could see, first, the superstition, and then the spell, of the place being broken. Surrey pulled out their finest game, and Kent (not a strong side this year) were correspondingly unskilful. Luck may have been against Kent, but, without doubt, they were beaten on the merits of the game.

One of the game's great superstitions, then, has gone, but the fact will not lessen the superstition of luck, which is really the essence of the game. Half of what is called the "glorious uncertainty" comes from the wayward meandering of luck, and in a game where skill is so nicely balanced by fortune immortal popularity is assured.

The Port of London.

London is to be an ocean port for passengers—staggering news, but true. The Port of London Authority is about to undertake a wonderful scheme of development, which, besides doing many other things chiefly in connection with merchant shipping, will make Tilbury a convenient place for the embarkation and disembarkation of ocean passengers. When the Tilbury Docks were opened, in 1886, the largest vessel to be accommodated was 485 ft. in length and had a beam of 46 ft.; now we have White Star liners, like the Majestic, 915 ft. long and 100 ft. broad. Everyone, of course, says that this persistent increase in the size of vessels must stop, but the Port of London Authority is taking no chances, and contemplates building a lock 1,150 ft. in length and 130 ft. in breadth, with thirteen berths!

To enable this scheme to be realised the Government are advancing a sum of 4½ millions sterling for a period of thirty years, the rate of interest being 3½ per cent. It is good news from every point of view, but especially in consideration of the unemployment which seems to be ever with us.

An Airship Service.

At length the Government has decided to accept in principle the scheme for an Imperial Air Service, and the decision may well become historical, because if, as the designers of the scheme claim, India can be reached by airship in three days and Australia in seven, our Imperial communications will be quickly revolutionised. The airship during the War got a very bad name, and its military value is nowadays scarcely discussed. Bad luck, moreover, has attended the fate of many airships since the War. But a reasonable degree of safety seems to have been obtained by the building of mooring masts and the surrounding of the inner gasbags with a layer of non-inflammable gas; in any case, the Government has committed itself to the main proposition of Commander Burney (the inventor of the paravane during the War), though the details have yet to be agreed upon.

THE NEAR AND MIDDLE EAST ASSOCIATION.

A meeting of the Near and Middle East Association was held on July 26 at 64, Queen's Gate, by kind invitation of the Dowager Lady Boyle. Major-General Lord Edward Gleichen presided. Sir Edward Boyle, the first speaker, took the outlook in Bulgaria as his subject. He pointed out that the new régime was not a government supported only by the old parties. There was a strong reaction in the country against the old parties, and a general desire to start with a clean slate. He considered that the Government was anxious to administer the country justly. Its future, however, depended on the extent to which it could command the support of the moderates of the Agrarian Party. After a reference to a Bulgarian outlet to the Ægean, Sir Edward Boyle said that he looked forward to the future of Bulgaria with tempered optimism, and he reminded his audience that there could be no peace in the Balkans until the Macedonian question was settled.

Mr. C. Frank Whittall, speaking with the experience of forty years in the Near East, testified to the admiration which the Turks had always had, and still had, for the British. He considered that if we treated them honestly and fairly in the future our influence five or ten years hence would be as predominating as it had been in the past.

The third address was given by Mr. H. Charles Woods, who briefly reviewed the situation in each of the Balkan countries. With regard to the Treaty of Lausanne, he pointed out that the Near and Middle East Association might well exert its influence to persuade the Turks not to be too extreme, but to show themselves worthy of the trust placed in them. In particular there should be fair treatment for Armenians and Greeks. Mr. Woods held that more attention should be paid in Great Britain to Albania.

Among those who took part in the discussion were Miss Durham, Sir Graham Bower, and Mr. Alfred Silley. Others present included the Lord Lamington, Sir Henry and Lady Burd, Prince and Princess Soumbatoff, Mehmed Konitza Bey, Sir John Miller, Sir William Clarke, Sir Ali Iman, and Kasim Pasha.

BULGARIA.

Sofia, July 24.

The Bolshevist Round-Up.

When the Agrarians were thrown out of power it was fairly certain that the new Government would take active measures against the Communists. The latter had been allowed to do as they liked under the Agrarian régime. They were working in close liaison with Moscow, and several hundred well-paid agents were scattered all over Bulgaria. The Russian Bolshevists in Bulgaria were not very numerous, but they were able to disguise their activities under the cloak of the Red Cross. In 1922 several thousand Russian refugees in Bulgaria expressed the desire to return to their country. The Soviet Government was anxious that they should return, but insisted that a Mission should be allowed to enter Bulgaria in order to supervise the work of repatriation. This Mission was styled the Red Cross, and undertook not to indulge in any work other than repatriation. The High Commission for the Russian Refugees Section of the League of Nations collaborated with the Red Cross in that it arranged transport for the returning refugees. Unfortunately, the Red Cross did not confine itself to repatriation. The Bulgarian authorities found documents showing that the members of the Red Cross were seriously implicated in several Bolshevist plots and intrigues. The Government decided, therefore, that it could not tolerate the presence of the Red Cross any longer, and that it must be expelled. Four days ago the Mission was arrested, and its offices and its archives were seized. Yesterday the Mission was transported to Varna, whence it will proceed to Russia. The Bulgarian authorities have all along shown the utmost consideration towards the Mission.

No doubt the Soviet will protest very vigorously against the action of the Bulgarian Government, and will allege that the immunity usually enjoyed by the Red Cross has been violated. It is, however, necessary to emphasise that, as relations between Moscow and Sofia are already very strained, it was almost impossible for a Soviet Red Cross Mission to remain in Bulgaria. The action taken by the Government is generally approved, especially as it is announced that repatriation of Russians who wish to return home will be continued if circumstances permit.

Internal Politics.

The situation created by the events of June 9 is beginning to become clear. Although all parties, except the Agrarians and the Communists, promised their support to M. Zankoff's Government, this support was not sufficient so long as the bourgeois parties remained separate one from the other. The Democrats, Narodniaks, and Radicals have been negotiating for the past three weeks with a view to forming a federation of parties which will support M. Zankoff. This federation is not yet an accomplished fact, but it probably will be within a few days. M. Zankoff is entirely in favour of a united bourgeoisie, and if the parties do not make the federation themselves he and his friends will try to make it for them.

The Cost of Living.

Although the value of the lev is still appreciating, there is practically no change in the cost of living. Everything imported from abroad remains very expensive. Ordinary cloth is almost twice as dear as it is in London. All tinned goods are very expensive. Luxuries such as silks and wines are literally four or five times dearer than they are in England or France. The reason for this is that importers are still out for big profits. Prices will not come down until the public refuse to buy. Concerning purely local produce, the peasants will also have to be content with smaller profits. Things like bread, butter, and milk are very dear. The townspeople, and especially the State employees, have been suffering from the effects of the agrarian policy of favouring the villages at the expense of the towns. Now the townspeople demand that the Government make a thorough inquiry into the cost of living, in order that profiteers may be punished and prices re-adjusted all round.

The Turkish Peace.

Bulgarians view with a certain amount of cynical amusement the settlement arrived at between the Allies and Turkey at Lausanne. They point out that Turkey has by the use of force gained a multitude of advantages. She is better off than before the war, and Bulgarians naturally wish that they also had been in a position more or less to dictate terms. The wish is heightened by the news that the Lausanne Conference will come to an end without discussing the right of Bulgaria to obtain an Ægean outlet. M. Morfoff, Bulgarian Delegate to the Conference, has, it is true, succeeded in getting the Allies to insert a clause in the new Turkish Treaty whereby Bulgaria retains her right to an outlet, but there are no indications as to when this question will be considered. At the risk of repeating oneself, it is necessary to point out that Balkan peace can never be really assured until the Allies adopt the elementary principles of justice towards Bulgaria. They solemnly promised her an Ægean outlet, and they also guaranteed the protection of her Minorities. Their promises and guarantees have not been carried out. Is it a wonder that Bulgaria reads with apathy the declarations of European statesmen concerning their desire for world peace based on justice?

The Escape of Agrarians.

It is reported that two prominent members of the Agrarian Party have escaped from the Sofia Prefecture in which they have been imprisoned since June 9. Their escape was engineered as follows: Two civilians arrived in a car at the Prefecture. They bore papers from the Attorney-General demanding that Krum Popoff, the former Mayor of Sofia, and Kolucheff, a journalist and intimate friend of Stambolisky, should be brought to him at once. The Commandant of the prison, seeing that the papers were quite in order, and supposing that the Attorney-General desired to examine the two prisoners, allowed them to leave. A few minutes afterwards he became suspicious, and telephoned the Attorney-General. The latter denied having sent for any one, and it was then realised that an old trick had been once more successfully played. All that is known of Popoff and Kolucheff is that they left Sofia by the main Constantinople road.

Constantinople, July 24.

Turkey and Britain.

It was gratifying to see that at the concluding business session of the eternal Lausanne Conference Sir Horace Rumbold expressed the hope to Ismet Pasha that the traditional friendly relations between Turkey and Great Britain would gradually recover their old footing. It is a good thing to show that we bear no malice; we have consistently—almost meticulously—emphasised the fact that until the actual physical signature of peace we are technically enemies; such consistency is part of the make-up of ourselves, who pride ourselves on being a most law-abiding race. Now that peace is signed we are technically friends, and shall act as such, and honour the signatures of our plenipotentiaries to the bond. Just as before the conclusion of peace we did not play at being friends under the mask of an official enemy, so now we shall not act as enemies in the guise of official friends.

The Ignorance of Constantinople.

The present "provinciality" of Constantinople, to which I have referred in previous letters, has never been more obvious than it has been during the past fortnight. Not only has it been hopelessly ignorant of the state of negotiations during the last days of the Conference, but it is still without any news whatsoever of the state of affairs in Anatolia. The Constantinople Press is starved for news, and is reduced to "silly season canards." It is an unhealthy sign. The Constantinople Press, however indifferent it may be, is the only part of the Turkish Press to which foreign opinion has access, and it would be merely common sense on the part of the Press directorate at Angora to keep it supplied with good authentic news of the happenings throughout Turkey. For want of more substantial fodder, Constantinople circles have been feeding upon a weird selection of sensational rumours of serious outbreaks of disorder in the Eastern vilayets and the Pontus; the director of the Press at Angora will not deserve to be promoted to Ministerial rank, as is proposed, unless he can so organise Press affairs that the only important organs, i.e., those of Constantinople, are in a position to perform the primordial function of the Press, i.e., to supply news. The Yeni Gun is poor sustenance for breakfast, dinner, and tea.

Turkish Enlightenment.

As your correspondent does not hesitate to offer vigorous criticism of the Turks' actions whenever they seem to him unjust or unwise, so it would be unfair not to draw attention to their happier inspirations. There are indications that the Government is going to be reasonable on the subject of the application of the Dry Régime to Constantinople and perhaps Smyrna. That shows a certain amount of sweet reasonableness, and, incidentally, will profit the exchequer. Another point is the action of Angora in annulling an ordinance of the vilayet which abolished the teaching of French in the Turkish schools of Constantinople. Turkish parents very sensibly protested to Angora against this stupid example of short-sighted chauvinism, and the Minister of Public Instruction took action accordingly. Angora may have feared that the application of this ruling would have driven more Turkish pupils into the French schools: but, in any case, the encouragement of the teaching of foreign languages is sound policy, for, whatever the political aspirations of the future Turkey, and whatever group of States it may favour with its adhesion, it will have to do its business in a European language, and the youth of the country will have to get its education from European sources. The degree to which education in Constantinople is in the hands of Europe-inspired institutions is illustrated by the interesting figures just published by the Directorate of Public Instruction. There are 209 official Turkish elementary and secondary schools under the directorate: there are 687 unattached schools, of which only 67 are Turkish private schools; 99 are foreign schools, and the remainder are non-Moslem private schools. Although the University and several other senior institutions, such as the commercial school, the engineering school, and so on, are official Turkish establishments, it will be seen that the authorities have a great deal of leeway to make up before they

A Week of Festivities.

The present week is going to be a round of festivities. Yesterday the fête of the proclamation of the Constitution was celebrated with great displays of flags, triumphal arches, and illuminations. To-day is a holiday to celebrate the signature of peace, and for most of the rest of the week it is Kourban Bairam. The net result is that Turkish Government offices are going to be closed throughout the week except for a short period on Saturday morning. The banks are closing for two days only, and we devoutly hope that the unofficial busybodies who are clamouring for the puritanical observance of Friday as a day of rest will not extend their activities to the shops where we purchase the necessities of life.

PERSIA.

Teheran, June 23.

The Fall of the Cabinet.

As predicted in my last letter, the Cabinet has fallen, Mustaufi el Mumalik having remained in power just over three months, which has come to be practically recognised as the length of life of recent Persian Cabinets! After much discussion on the subject, the Mejliss decided to call the Government to the House, and the interpellation took place on 11th instant, nominally on a question of the Prime Minister's foreign policy. After speeches had been made for and against the Government by Soleiman Mirza and Modarres respectively, Mustaufi el Mumalik rose, and, in an able, scathing speech, he declared that, apparently, a Prime Minister, to succeed, must give and receive bribes, and as he was averse from doing this, the country must find someone less scrupulous to succeed him. Thereupon, without waiting for a vote to be taken, he called on his Ministers to leave the Mejliss, and they immediately proceeded to the Shah's Palace of Farahabad outside the town and laid their resignation before His Majesty. Meanwhile, all was commotion at the Parliament, both inside the House—which was packed by partisans of the Government and of the Opposition—and outside in the Parliament Square, where dense crowds had assembled to await the result of the impeachment, and fisticuffs were freely resorted to, people running about and shouting in favour of or against Mustaufi's Cabinet. The Minister of War, who was about to leave the Mejliss, was appealed to by Motamen ul Mulk, the President of the Parliament, to restore order, and the military and police thereupon proceeded to disperse the crowds, which they eventually succeeded in doing by the use of their bayonets and truncheons. Many people were thus wounded and injured and had to be removed to hospital, and all those who were within the Mejliss grounds were confined in the building all night to prevent further disorder; they were released the next day. The President of the Parliament and the Minister of War have been much criticised for their action in resorting to force to disperse the crowd, and the Setareh Iran, one of the leading daily papers, was suspended some days ago, presumably for these attacks.

The New Cabinet.

It was not until the 13th that it was announced that Mustaufi el Mumalik's resignation had been accepted by the Shah, who then called upon Mushir ed Dowleh to form a Cabinet. It will be remembered that the latter was Prime Minister at the beginning of 1922, forming a Cabinet just before the Shah left for his trip to Europe in January.

Mushir ed Dowleh has formed the following Ministry, with the exception of the Minister of Public Works, who has not yet been appointed:—

Prime Minister and Minister of the Interior	MUSHIR ED DOWLEH
Minister for Foreign Affairs	MOSSADEGH ES SALTANEH
Minister of Finance	ZOKA UL MULK
Minister of Justice	HAKIM UL MULK
Minister of Public Instruction	HAKIM ED DOWLEH
Minister of Posts and Telegraphs	FAHIM ED DOWLEH
Minister of War	SARDAR SEPAH
Acting Minister of the Interior	ETELA ES SALTANEH

The Cabinet is, on the whole, well received, and Mushir ed Dowleh is to be congratulated on his promptitude, thus avoiding the danger, which at one time was feared, of a protracted Cabinet crisis, leaving the country without a Government, in view of the dissolution of Parliament, which, having run its appointed term of two years, was yesterday dissolved without incident. There seems, to judge from personal observation, to be a general feeling of relief among most people that the fourth Mejliss has come to an end, the closing of which the local Punch portrays as a funeral procession!

General News.

The elections for the new Mejliss have been practically completed, but the counting of the votes will take some time, and Parliament is not expected to reassemble for some months.

On the 10th instant the Shah called a meeting, at the Palace, of Princes, notables, and priests, at which he inaugurated a relief fund for the inhabitants of the region round Turbat-i-Haidari rendered homeless and destitute by the recent earthquake, himself contributing £1,000 and the Crown Prince £400. The fund has so far reached a total of some £3,000, but is likely to be greatly increased.

A conference was recently opened at the Foreign Office presided over by the Minister for Foreign Affairs to arrange the terms of a Customs Convention between Persia and Russia, the Russian Delegation including Shumyatsky, the Russian Chargé d'Affaires.

Mr. Sayed Hassan Imam, former Judge of the Calcutta High Court, has been invited to represent India at the forthcoming meeting of the League of Nations.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

Egypt.

In the Morning Post of July 20 a writer, who styles himself "An Egyptian Patriot," writes on the subject of "Egypt of To-day." He begins by stating that the political movement in Egypt during the last four years is based on anything but patriotic motives, and that the cry for "independence" is an unreal one. Passing to the question of whether Egypt can safely dispense with the services of Englishmen, he asserts that with all previous foreign Governors of Egypt the aim has been to suck the very life-blood of the hopeless natives. Opposition to the English is really based on three things: hatred of Christians, fanaticism and the desire to create a new Khalifate in Egypt, and the just and incorruptible methods of the English. He then comes down to the question of a Zaghloul régime:—

> But what will become of the country if the Zaghloulites should succeed? It will be governed by destitute lawyers and ruthless students, who will drag the country into anarchy at the head of the blind fellaheen, who are at this moment ready to jump into the abyss of Bolshevism, as they have been during the last two or three years very badly treated by their merciless landlords. Our troubles will only come to an end when Egypt once more enjoys a benevolent bureaucracy like that of Lords Cromer and Kitchener.

In short, his conclusion is that England must at once return to Egypt:—

> It will be disastrous for Egypt and England to let matters drift as they are now doing. It would be wise and courageous to admit that the political experiment advocated by some sincere but shortsighted Englishmen has failed, and that England must once more feel that it is her duty to protect the prosperity and progress started by her sons in Egypt. If England does not at once understand the situation, or if she be reluctant to take over the responsibility of administering this country, she will find it, in a very short interval, a bankrupt and a devastated country requiring Herculean efforts to reform. The people in Egypt have become thoroughly tired of politics, and it is the duty of England to save the "backbone" of Egypt from the grip of the parasites; otherwise the Empire's highway will become a nest of Bolshevism and anarchy.

The New Statesman of July 21, after pointing out that the abolition of martial law and the passing of the Indemnity Act have not given the complete satisfaction that was hoped for in Egypt, states its belief that the fears of the Nationalist objectors are exaggerated, and that, instead of picking holes in the Indemnity Act, they should concentrate on winning the forthcoming elections. The difficulties confronting the Egyptian people do not, it says, derive from the possible abuse of the Act; they are of a different order:—

> The authority of the King under the new Constitution is great—perhaps it may prove to be dangerously great. The High Commissioner's powers may turn out to be great or small; we do not yet know exactly what they are to be. We do not know what are to be his relations to the King, nor the strength of the forces under his command, nor what control he is to have over Egyptian finances or in certain other departments of the administration. All these delicate questions are to be settled after the elections, when the new parliamentary régime is in complete working order, and we hope there will be no attempt on our part to whittle down the promised independence of Egypt. If there is, there will, of course, be trouble, and we shall have to give way in the end. But for the moment the task of the Egyptian democrats is to concentrate on the elections. If they get the sweeping majority they have predicted they will be in a stronger position to talk both to the British Government and to their own reactionaries.

Modern Abyssinia.

The July issue of Outward Bound contains an article by Major Henry Darley, R.F.A., on "Abyssinia of To-day." The writer, who was Frontier Agent in South-West Abyssinia, has a sorry tale to tell of the plight into which the country has fallen since the death of the Emperor Menelik. After briefly sketching the history of Abyssinia, in which he points out the fanatical Christianity of the Abyssinians, he comes to the time of the Emperor Menelik. Menelik, a remarkable man, not only pacified the country, but enlarged it, and, to a certain extent, modernised it. But with his death about ten years ago the whole thing fell in, and "Abyssinia has reverted to a state of savagery." Major Darley gives a vivid description of this reversion from his own experiences in the Southern and Western districts, inhabited by the Gallas and the Shangallas. These districts, once the richest part of Abyssinia, are now becoming a desert. Slavery there is rampant.

Major Darley concludes his article by insisting on the potential riches of Abyssinia. This country should, but for the exclusive policy of the Government, be the heart of North-East Africa; if there were any means of connection between it and Somaliland, Kenya, Uganda, and the Sudan, an enormous trade would immediately spring up. But while the Abyssinian Government persists, not only in keeping the foreigner from the country, but even in preventing his attempting to remedy any of their abuses, there is little hope. This aim of the Abyssinian Government is further assisted by the policy of England, France, and Italy, who have agreed to uphold the power of the Government. For the extinct races of Southern Abyssinia there is no hope, unless the League of Nations were to take the matter up, and even then it would be action alone that would count: "Talking is not the slightest use. Action is the only thing that counts in Africa."

PATIALA.

"PATIALA: THE GREAT WAR." A brief history of the Services of the Premier Punjab State. Compiled from Secretariat and Other Records. (Printed by the Medici Society, Ltd., London, for private circulation, 1923.)

The name of the author, or the compiler, of this record does not appear, but it is, perhaps, one of the Patiala officials, at any rate, one who has had access to Patiala State papers. To those who know India, particularly to those who know the Punjab and the Sikhs, this record will be interesting reading. It shows how an Indian State, under the rule of a Prince who is descended from a long line of military ancestors, and, especially, who is the son of his father, the late Maharaja Rajindar Singh, was able, with the assistance of capable State officials, and, above all, with such magnificent material as the Patiala Sikhs at hand, to furnish no less than 28,000 fighting men to the British Army at a time during the Great War when every good fighting man was of the utmost value. The Maharaja himself was one of the first of the Indian Princes to place his own personal services and all the resources of his State at the disposal of His Majesty the King-Emperor. The Maharaja actually embarked and had proceeded part of the way to the front when he was compelled by illness to return to India, greatly to his disappointment. On his recovery the Maharaja took up at once the initiation of an arduous recruiting campaign within the limits of his State, which was so successful that in the end Patiala made the splendid contribution already mentioned. Not only this, Patiala supplied largely the equipment of her troops, and the Maharaja assisted the Government in various other ways—notably by a contribution to the Indian War Loan of 35 lakhs, or more than £200,000.

Chapters III. and IV. contain interesting accounts of the services of some of the Patiala troops in the field, and, to judge from the list of honours and rewards accorded them, given on p. 25, the troops must have done well. Here we should have liked to have seen given the names of the European officers who trained the Patiala men, and of those who accompanied them on service. Appendix 3 contains a biographical sketch, being an extract from an article by Lord Carnwarth (Loyal Rulers and Leaders of the East, 1922), in which we are glad to see praise bestowed on the late Maharaja Rajindar Singh, who fought for us on the North-West Frontier of India, and who first raised the Patiala Imperial Service Troops.

The book before us would have been better for the omission of the rather fulsome personal references to the present Maharaja. After all, facts speak for themselves, and the author should have remembered that "true fame demands not panegyric aid." The book has been well produced, save for the error of printing page 81 twice. There is an excellent likeness of the present Maharaja as a frontispiece, and there are some other good photographs to illustrate the period spent by the Maharaja at the different fronts.

THE CRUSADES.

"THE CRUSADES." By Ernest Barker. (Oxford University Press. Price 2s. 6d. net.)

The service that the Oxford University Press are doing to the student, and, indeed, to any reader of general intelligence, by issuing their series of "The World's Manuals" is considerable, and this latest volume on the Crusades maintains the standard authoritatively set by earlier books. Though this particular book is, in the main, a reprint from the Encyclopædia Britannica, the republication of Mr. Barker's article is extremely timely. Ignorance of the East on the part of the West is perhaps a chronic reproach, but it ought, at any rate, to be dispelled in part by this series of manuals.

It is, perhaps, a little unfortunate that in this book Mr. Barker should have acted so purely as an historian and so infrequently as an interpreter of events. For from the history of the Crusades much can be learned that is of value on the relations now existing and to exist between the East and the West. The motives of action are, indeed, far different now from what they were at the time of the Crusades, but the struggle between East and West is a perpetual one, and few people believe in the possibility of a permanent alliance. Now it is religion, now race, that divides Europe from Asia: to-morrow it may be something else. But though temporary amity may be possible, real fusion seems one of the remotest things to be conceived. Yet impartially to study the respective actions of East and West, their reactions, and their inter-actions, is the only method by which understanding and peace can be achieved, and an easy start in such an endeavour may be made with this little book on the Crusades. Facts, after all, are the things that count—it was the ignoring of them that eventually forced upon Europe the peace of Lausanne—and it goes without saying, seeing that Mr. Barker is an Oxford historian, that all the facts about the Crusades are here in his article. The mastery of them may be a dry task, but it is an essential one to the intelligent student of Eastern affairs.

BRITISH RELIEF IN CONSTANTINOPLE.

The work of the British Relief Societies in Constantinople has been so far successful that whereas in March last the death-rate among the Greek refugees was more than 1,000 a week, it is now practically normal, although the number of refugees has increased. The cost to the All-British Appeal has been £1,250. The Appeal is now negotiating for the evacuation of the refugees to Greece, where they could be placed in a settlement scheme and become self-supporting, and it now asks the public for financial assistance to carry the scheme through. Donations should be sent to the All-British Appeal, General Buildings, Aldwych, W.C.2.

WHERE THE SHOE PINCHES.

With the signature of the Treaty of Lausanne Turkey no longer occupies the centre of the Near Eastern picture. Her long diplomatic struggle is over; she has secured the cancellation of the Treaty of Sèvres and has been placed on an equality with the other nations of Europe. She must now be given time to see what she can make of her independence and the new conditions. The Allied Powers, it is to be hoped, will honour the spirit of the Treaty by refraining until the last moment from any attempt at interference with Turkish affairs. The conditions of peace must be observed; but let the Allies act as long as possible on the principle that the terms were based on their own resolve to give the Turks a fresh chance, and were not entirely dictated by the latter. Turkey for her part will have her hands too full with her own domestic affairs to yearn for any further spell of the limelight of Europe. During the protracted negotiations with the Allies a factitious prominence has attached to her foreign relations, and internal questions have been relegated to the background or have found a solution too easily to last, as a result of the national solidarity in the face of external pressure. The time has now come for foreign affairs to be put, as it were, into cold storage, and for the Turkish people to study domestic problems. It is clear that in such circumstances it will be better for the foreign residents in Turkey to do nothing, if they can help it, to divert the attention of the Turks from this testing of the new conditions. If the new order does not satisfy the Turkish people, it will be changed by them, and their own discontent is more likely to secure the improvements that the foreigners may need than will any action at this stage on the latter's part, while integrity and sovereignty are still words to conjure with in Turkey.

The quiescence of Turkey, however, although it marks the formal re-establishment of peace in the Near East, does not carry with it a settlement of the Near Eastern question. This, it is to be feared, will never be reached until there is a complete change in the attitude of the several countries in that part of the world. Taking their cue from France, but without the justification that she has, these States seem to consider that they have more to gain from the perpetuation of unsettled conditions than from the restoration of peace and good will. In no other way is it possible to account for the spirit of aggressive suspicion or declared hostility with which international matters are discussed in Central and South-Eastern Europe. The French have some reason to fear Germany; neither collectively nor individually have the Allied States in the Balkans anything to fear from either of the neighbour ex-enemy States, Hungary or Bulgaria. These two countries present a sharp contrast in the manner in which they have accepted the verdict of the Great War. The Magyars make no secret of their desire to kick against the pricks; but their plots and revolutions merely emphasise their impotence, and in no other part of the world would such nervous apprehension be shown by countries disposing of a million troops towards a people whose armed forces number only thirty thousand. The Bulgarians, on the other hand, have accepted the terms imposed upon them, have given ample indication of a genuine desire to cultivate good relations with their neighbours, and have by friendly discussion secured a revision of the reparations clauses of the Treaty in the light of common sense. Neither country, however, has received any encouragement from a neighbour. The Agreement of Nish between M. Stambolisky's Government and Yugoslavia did point to the possibility of better relations between the two countries; but it seems to have been based on the forcible suppression of the Macedonians, who are regarded as embarrassing by both. How far the refusal of the Entente Powers to redeem their pledge to Bulgaria of the grant of an outlet on the Ægean Sea is due to the antagonistic attitude of her neighbours is not known; the fact remains that this act of elementary justice has not yet been carried into effect. In the case of Hungary unreasoning hostility has gone so far as to prevent a settlement of the reparations question, with the result that the prospect of the Magyars' paying any sums at all, much less the amounts on which her neighbours are insisting, diminishes day by day. The chief blame attaches to the French Government, for allowing its representative on the Reparations Commission to defeat a sensible settlement by his casting vote. His action, however, was supported by the Little Entente, and does not, therefore, exonerate the latter.

The plea for a common-sense policy in the Near East is not prompted by any sentimental attachment to Magyars or Bulgarians. They may be all that they are painted or even worse; the fact would not affect the wisdom of treating them in such a way that at no point shall there be any unnecessary hindrance to the work of material reconstruction in the Near East. The financial situation in Hungary is a definite handicap to the economic progress of her neighbours; it has been brought about, at least to some extent, by the exaggerated fears and the hostility of the latter. Europe is entitled to find more political wisdom in the Balkans than she looks for in Turkey; but until some statesman or country can adopt a nobler and saner attitude towards a beaten and permanently weakened foe there would seem to be little to choose between Angora and the capitals of South-Eastern Europe. This week the Governments of the Little Entente have been in conference in Roumania. They will have had for their guidance a clearer picture than ever before of the consequences of French policy in the West. At the same time they will have noticed the steady trend of British policy, and it will be a matter for surprise if such a shrewd statesman as Dr. Benesh failed to point the moral. Czecho-Slovakia has already expressed her desire to be on as friendly terms with Hungary as she is with Austria; she has consistently given Bulgaria credit for good intentions. But the general attitude of the Little Entente has been suspicious and bellicose. If the Sinaia Conference is to be productive of good results, it must lead to a fresh orientation of the official policy of the Little Entente. The existence of the triple agreement is in itself ample guarantee for the absence of any aggression on the part of Hungary and Bulgaria. What is wanted, however, is a definite move to bring all the countries of South-Eastern Europe, without exception, into close political relationship, with a view to promoting the economic recovery of the whole region.

THE BOSPHORUS.

By "X. N. O."

Not long ago the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles were the subject of daily reference in the Press, how that the Turks were occupying the coast line or were demanding complete control over this gateway to the East, and one was apt to become somewhat tired of the sound of the waterway's names. We little realise how great a weapon such control could be in the hands of any one nation—great because it decides the destinies of those Eastern European nations whose only maritime outlet is the Danube, and thence by the Bosphorus to the outer world. The Bosphorus is the rock upon which many a conference has split, and, doubtless, will remain a bone of contention till the end of Time.

Apart from its commercial and strategic importance to the Turk, it also holds a position in the traditions and superstitions of the people which has no parallel. To the traveller or reader the word "Bosphorus" always seems to conjure up visions of steep, green-clad, tree-covered slopes running right down to swift moving, shimmering blue waters, with range after range of purply-blue hills in the background, fading away into infinity. Alas! the slopes still remain—but the Germanic influence of the War years has dotted them with dreadful red and white rococo villas built in the worst style. These same blue waters, that hold so great a charm for the traveller, exercise an inconceivable control over Turkey's destiny in the mind of "the Turk in the street."

The Bosphorus normally flows from East to West, urged on by the waters of the huge rivers that flow into the Black Sea, the Danube, Don, and Dnieper; a swift-moving current, often running as strongly as four knots when aided by an easterly wind. Tradition in Turkey decrees that, as long as the Bosphorus behaves itself and flows in the right direction, no harm can come to Turkey from the Western World. This superstition is not unfounded on fact, and doubtless dates from the old days of sailing ships, when a current, such as flows in the Bosphorus and Dardanelles, was sufficient to impede greatly an avenging or conquering fleet's progress towards the Sublime Porte. In our own history we have the case of Sir John Duckworth's ill-fated expedition in 1807—which started, by some strange coincidence, on the same day and month as the even more disastrous attempt of 1915—an expedition which barely succeeded in forcing the Narrows, and only then after considerable loss.

In much more recent times the Bosphorus has played an important part in Turkey's history.

After the débâcle of Smyrna, in September last year, when Mustapha Kemal's victorious army threatened to envelop Constantinople, only the Bosphorus, and the Fleet it bore on the bosom of its current, barred the way. In the dark days that followed, when everything was looking most gloomy in Constantinople, to the amazement of the Turks, their current, which, save for an occasional hour of inconstancy, had flowed westwards for centuries, chose to misbehave.

Looking out of my window from the heights of Taxim, I was astonished to see the ships in the anchorage—a couple of British battleships, some French, Greek, Italian, and American warships, and the usual quota of merchant shipping—swung to a current setting eastwards. It is not unusual for the inshore currents to vary, but for the midstream current to reverse the order of its going was unheard of!

In face of the national crisis and the expected intervention of Great Britain, the "Turk in the street" took this exhibition of perverseness on the part of his beloved Bosphorus as an augur of ill-omen. If the current should no longer help them, then who should stay the hand of the infidels in the West? The atmosphere in the bazaars became electric with foreboding. In the interim, one night, the moon rose red—red as war! Yet another ill-omen!

The fear of the superstitious knew no bounds. With revolvers, rifles, and ancient cannon they opened fire on the offending and importunate planet. Whether they hoped, however, to bring it down, or just put out its light, no one knows—and all this in 1922! All night long they maintained this fusillade till law-abiding Christians in Pera and the suburbs began to wonder if the threatened massacre, which was in everyone's mind, had at last come to pass. As may be expected, some of the bullets fired at the Blood Red Orb of Night found human billets. In spite of his superstitions, the innate humour of the Turk would never allow him to miss such a golden opportunity of settling a private racial or religious quibble. The moon offended him: superstition decreed that the bullet had to be fired, but why waste it on space?

At length, on the fifth day of the Bosphorus's perverseness, their fears were realised. The Infidel from the West came knocking at their gates. Like long, dark shadows destroyer after destroyer from the Atlantic Fleet—sent to reinforce the Mediterranean squadron—slipped into the Bosphorus and passed slowly up to its anchorage—a seemingly never-ending stream of menace.

Still the current persisted in aiding the Infidel. Battleships arrived, even more threatening in appearance than the snake-like destroyers; ships brought aeroplanes; and transports began to arrive—transports which poured forth stalwart men in khaki by the thousand—men in a uniform the Turk had learned to fear and respect but eight short years before. Things were beginning to look too black altogether.

A hasty meeting was held by the elders of the Church—green turbaned hodjas and white-bearded imams—and it was decided that the Evil Spirit that was bewitching their natural protector, and thereby threatening further ruin for the Ottoman Empire, must be appeased in some way.

Accordingly, a pilgrimage was made to the water's brink, and there the Spirit was exorcised—with complete success.

On the following morning the Bosphorus, tired of its contrariness, turned round again and flowed the proper way—from East to West—but the ships of the Infidel had got there and had anchored!

THE LOAN TO GREECE.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—Your reference to the International Loan to Greece, to which the Council of the League of Nations has decided to lend its support, seems to leave a doubt as to the most advantageous method to be adopted in its use and object.

The main problem seems to be to afford some relief for the millions of refugees that have been thrust into Greece from Asia Minor and Thrace, and at the same time to provide some useful and beneficial work for the improvement of the country generally. From observations I have made and experiences I have had in the northern parts of that territory and Macedonia generally, it would appear to me that much money could be quite well devoted to large and small irrigation schemes. There are vast plains which, during a few months of the year, appear quite fertile, but, owing to the lack of irrigation, become parched and barren wastes for the remaining hot months. The sources of water supply, coming as they do down from the mountains through winding ravines, entirely disappear early in the year, but, nevertheless, still continue to flow subterraneously at some little depth below the bed of the streams.

Concrete dams built in well-chosen places up stream will hold back these subterraneous supplies, and, forcing the water to the top, as much as one to two million gallons per day can be saved in quite moderate-sized ravines, and this, passing via aqueducts over to the plains below, would convert thousands of acres of barren waste into fertile and valuable land.

Short spurs of Decauville track could be run from these places to connect and join up with the nearest railways for transporting the products to the port of Salonika, which is a ready market for such commodities as can be grown. Really good tobacco plants are grown already in some districts there, but are dealt with only in a primitive manner. Likewise the silk industry, at present a village enterprise, could be further extended on a large scale by the cultivation in mass of the mulberry tree and cocoons. The vineyards, such as they are, certainly flourish, but not nearly to the extent possible with a little help from irrigation.

A typical "dam," which I constructed with the aid of native labour, complete with its sluices and aqueducts, can be seen just above the village of Langavuk, intended to irrigate the vast plain between the two large lakes Beshik and Langaza, on the road to Stavros.—I am, etc.,

IAZIRAT EL ARAB.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—I hear from Palestine that the Mecca newspaper, Al-Kibla, puts forward the claim to the Orontes as the northern boundary of what is called Iazirat el-Arab, or Island of the Arabs.

This claim, I beg to state, is not in accordance with the classical definition of that boundary which is definitely fixed as "towards the Sea of Syria"; consequently any part of Syria remains outside of the boundary in question.—I am, etc.,

THE EARTHQUAKE IN PERSIA.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—You were good enough a few weeks ago to publish a telegram which I received from the British Minister at Teheran appealing for British contributions to the relief of the widespread distress caused by the earthquake at Turbati-Haidari. I have now received a further appeal from the Minister emphasising the urgent need of help. The fund which I have opened has already received some support, including a subscription of £25 from this Society; but further donations are desired. They should be sent to the Honorary Treasurer of the Society, care of Imperial Bank of Persia, 25, Abchurch Lane, E.C.4.—I am, etc.,

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London,
Tuesday Morning.

The British Industries Fair.

Next year's Fair is to be held much later than usual, the dates fixed being from April 28 to May 9. A good many weeks ago I drew attention to the obvious danger of holding the Fair before the British Empire Exhibition was in being, for it needs no demonstration that overseas buyers are not going to incur the expense of two journeys to this country in one year. The action of the authorities makes it certain that the Fair will suffer to a minimum extent from the competition of the Exhibition. Held at the same time, they should give a great impetus to British commercial endeavour at a time when it is most needed, for the Fair and Exhibition are not in any way similar in character, and the ground they cover will be different.

The Indo-European Telegraph Company.

The news that the Indo-European Telegraph Company's line will now again be available for international telegraph traffic marks a notable stage in the return to pre-war facilities of communication. The line runs to the Far East by way of Germany, Poland, Russia, and Persia, and the missing link has been the German section. The German concession has now been renewed for a period of eighteen months, and thus at long last the unwearying efforts of the directors of the company meet with success.

Russian Enterprise in Persia.

Russia's trade relations with Persia during the last year or so have had their vicissitudes. At first Russian commercial penetration was supremely successful, but a Customs tariff which pressed hardly on Persia's exports to her neighbour shook the belief of the Persians in the good faith of Russia, and this faux pas has taken a good deal of living down. Apparently the Russians are now under the impression that the last remnants of misunderstanding over the matter have passed. At any rate, they are very energetically proceeding with the good work of "improving" trade relations between the two countries. A large Russian trade delegation is at present visiting Persia, a new Russian bank is to be opened in Teheran, while the programme also includes an exhibition of Russian goods. Persia should be flattered by these disinterested attentions, but one wonders what she is going to get out of it all. The same thought may occur to the Persians one of these days.

Germany Aga'n.

A recent American report gives a further illustration of the fact of which we were so well aware before the War that no market is ever too small for the solicitous attentions of Germany. It appears that about a couple of months ago 200 pairs of German-made canvas shoes with chrome soles appeared in the Aden market, and proved very popular with the natives on account of their cheapness. To make the most of the market, the shoes were even "peddled" from door to door, and at the time the report was made not more than 50 pairs remained unsold. The shoes were originally sold at three rupees a pair, but later the price was raised to five rupees, and even at that it was well below the price of the British shoes of corresponding quality, which sell at eight rupees, and so one must assume that German shoes will keep the market, for the time at any rate. The incident is interesting both for the evidence it provides of German thoroughness and for the light it throws on the favourable position of Germany as a result of the exchanges.

Imperial Ottoman Bank.

The past year was one of exceptional difficulty for the Imperial Ottoman Bank. The Greco-Turkish War affected the whole of the Near East, and greatly contributed to the incidence of the trade depression in that region. Some falling off in the profits of the bank was, therefore, inevitable, and it must be regarded as extremely satisfactory in the circumstances that the bank should be able to show net profits of £176,140, as compared with £268,553 for the previous period.

The Shipping Slump.

At the annual meeting of Furness, Withy, and Co. the chairman, Sir Frederick Lewis, took a rather unpromising view of trade prospects. The past year has, of course, been a uniformly bad one in the shipping industry, which has been affected by the depression to a greater extent probably than any other branch of commerce. A very small proportion of the profits of Furness, Withy, and Co., Sir Frederick pointed out, were derived from the company's steamers. The effect of trade conditions on freight rates was such that it was only with the utmost difficulty that expenses could be paid, and even then it had been necessary for the company, in common with other shipping companies, to lay up a proportion of their own and associated tonnage. He went on to mention that the tonnage laid up at the thirty-six principal ports of the United Kingdom on July 1 amounted to 712,000 net tons, as compared with 546,555 tons on April 1. Unless there was an unforeseen improvement, he feared that that figure would be increased.

THE PROGRESS OF PALESTINE.

Improving Financial Position.

It cannot be said that the many criticisms against the British relationship with Palestine find much justification in actual fact. In reality, the report on the administration of the country in 1922, which has just been issued, is quite an encouraging document. One does not find there a picture of a land "flowing with milk and honey," it is true; but there is placed on record a story of slow but steady and encouraging progress. The revenue has expanded, and if the expenditure has also increased, there is, at any rate, quite a substantial balance on the right side (even if allowance be made for the yield of taxes formerly allocated to the Ottoman Public Debt Administration), which is more than could be said for the year ended March 31, 1921. Trade was well maintained during the year, agricultural development went on apace, while progress was made in the development of transport facilities. Taken all round, and considering the external and internal conditions which had to be faced, developments seem to have been quite satisfactory, and the report generally gives no foundation for the view that the country is one in which an economic advance can only be purchased, if at all, at a great price. If only political considerations were not present to impose a stumbling-block to progress, it would be possible to be fairly confident as to the future of Palestine. Unfortunately, politics versus economics summarises the present situation, and it is entirely due to the preponderance of the former factor that developments have not been more rapid since the Armistice. No one who takes an unprejudiced view of the country can deny the benefit that has accrued to it from the help of Jewish capital, brains, and enterprise; but fear of Zionist ambitions has, unfortunately, alarmed the Arabs, and intensified the problems with which the country is confronted. Possibly there has been insufficient care exercised in the past as regards the selection of immigrants, to judge from the fact inter alia that in recent months there has been a considerable emigration of Jews from Palestine. As the country is still only at the very beginning of its development as an agricultural region, it follows that the scope for the varied industries of a civilised community outside farming pure and simple are bound to be limited as yet, and the field of employment (as we know the term) ipso facto restricted. The fullest recognition of that fact is essential, for nothing could be more unfortunate than the existence in Palestine of a considerable surplus of labour incapable of absorption because of the incapacity of the individuals to undertake agricultural work.

Turning to the statistics given in the report, it is to be noted that there was a very great increase in revenue for the year ended March 31, 1922, the total being £E2,312,243, as compared with £E1,108,528 for the period July 1, 1920, to March 31, 1921. With the exception of one item—rent of Government property—substantial increases were recorded under every head. Customs receipts rose from £E272,600 to £E623,273, licences, taxes, etc., from £E336,676 to £E758,144, fees of court or office, reimbursements, etc., from £E65,687 to £E150,496, posts, telegraphs and telephones from £E65,965 to £E121,222, and railways from £E318,503 to £E557,334. This record cannot, by any stretch of imagination, be said to bespeak an unhealthy state of affairs. It suggests prima facie the orderly pursuance of the road of peaceful progress towards prosperity. There was also a considerable increase on the expenditure side, the total rising from £E1,228,097 to £E1,881,108. Here again, with the exception of a few items, there was an all-round increase. There are substantial advances under such heads as posts, telegraphs and telephones, which stand at £E87,626 as against £E53,796, and railways, which have risen from £E305,677 to £E527,657, and similar services, whose expansion is a corollary of a country's development. The balance of revenue over expenditure was £E431,135 as compared with a debit balance of £E119,569. The revenue, it is to be noted, includes £E314,724, representing the yield of the taxes allocated to the Ottoman Public Debt Administration.

The commerce of Palestine in 1922 has already been dealt with at length in these columns, and it is therefore unnecessary to make any extended reference to it here. The total volume of trade showed a slight shrinkage on the figures of the previous year, but this is probably more than counterbalanced by the shrinkage in values, while the returns for 1922 do not include the import and export transit trade with Syria. The noteworthy fact is pointed out in the report that the prevailing world economic depression has not appreciably affected Palestine's trade. The reason for this is to be found in the special circumstances of the country. It has not had the experience of industrial regions, which have found their markets temporarily non-existent, fair outlets have been available for its staple products, while the military occupation and the influx of emigrants and capital has been a constant source of economic strength. The general conclusion to be drawn from the report is that careful administration has admirably succeeded with the task of reorganising and developing the country's resources, and that given favourable conditions the way is now clear for very considerable progress.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Quiet but Firm.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ended July 20, state:—

Since our last report the futures market has been rather quiet, although at the close prices have slightly improved.

There is again very little to say about the market. The statistical position is very strong, but the demand from abroad continues to be almost negligible and speculators, generally heavy losers, prefer to adopt for the time being a waiting policy. News from America regarding the progress of the crop is, generally speaking, favourable, and this has had its reflection on the distant positions the prices of which have recently been distinctly easier. Latest reports from the leading textile centres have been discouraging; American spinners have been curtailing their production, and in Lancashire much depression is still in evidence. On the Continent, with the Ruhr and the Reparations questions so involved and exchanges so depressed, not much trade activity can be expected. Egyptians in Liverpool have been almost unchanged; a large proportion of the daily spot sales is, we understand, for export account. This week's receipts amounted to 2,098 kantars, and the total since September 1 now stands at 6,629,877. Exports have this week amounted to 53,977 kantars, and the stock now stands at 1,126,611 kantars, against 1,178,490 kantars a week ago and 1,712,204 kantars a year ago.

Spot.—We have had a week of poor markets at Minet el Bassal and sales amount to about 3,200 bales, of which we estimate 2,200 bales of Sakellarides and 1,000 bales Uppers. Demand from spinners is very poor, and trade reports from abroad, with talk of curtailment by American spinners, are far from encouraging, but nevertheless there is no pressure to sell by holders, and cotton below F.G.F. is extremely hard to buy.

Sakellarides.—All styles have been dealt in. Prices of spot against contracts are without change except for Fair and Fully Fair, which are little easier but in very small supply.

Uppers.—The business has been mainly in medium and good grades, the lower grades being neglected, but, as in Sakellarides, scarce and dear. Prices of spot against contracts are rather easier than last week.

Brown and White are neglected; no business is reported in Brown, a few bales of White have changed hands at rather easier rates.

Crop 1923.—The Government has published its first report on the acreage of the crop of this year, the figure given being 1,460,022 feddans, of which 362,767 feddans for Upper Egypt and 1,097,255 feddans for Lower Egypt against a total of 1,800,000 feddans last year (corrected final Government figure). However, from private reports received from the interior it appears that the land planted under cotton this year is at least equal to that of last year. In spite of the fact that the crop is not progressing equally well in all the districts, on average, we think the development of the plant is rather satisfactory.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Steady Business Reported.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended July 25:—

Another quiet week has been experienced in this section of the trade, and no feature worthy of remark has cropped up. A steady business has taken place, which justly reflects the rather fortunate position of the Egyptian spinning section as compared with that of their less favoured brethren on the American side. The buying that occurred was obviously to satisfy immediate requirements, and although a little more c.i.f. business has been transacted in certain quarters, interest in forward cotton, and particularly for new crop shipments, remains just as apathetic as ever. The bulk of the inquiry has been for Sakellaridis, 15¾d. to 16¼d., and buyers have found an attractive selection to choose from in the docket cotton, which is at present being offered all round the market on a basis which is often reasonable as compared with the stale consignment cotton which generally forms the major portion of the stock at this season of the year

Cotton, very near (if not fully up to) the "good" mark, changed hands at 120 points on November—i.e., 15.80d.—notwithstanding that the official quotation for good Sakellaridis stood at 16.70d. on the same day. Uppers have been pressed for sale for the most part, although, here and there, one meets with cotton which is firmly held at what appear to-day to be fancy prices. This cotton, of course, is more susceptible to the vagaries of the American markets than Sakellaridis, and the recent heavy declines in New York have seriously affected the basis. It is quite possible, however, that those who hold uppers now will have cause to rejoice that they did so before the new crop gets under way. Two more critical months remain before anything like a reasonably sufficient American crop can be assured, and the upper basis is certain to react speedily to any word of serious crop deterioration in the States.

More business has been done in Soudan cotton this week, the White variety being chiefly in request. A few lots of Tokar Sakellaridis have changed hands at between 17½d.-18d.; above these prices the cotton is given the cold shoulder. The customary inquiry for low cotton, 6d.-8d. and 10d.-12d., continues, but with only a moderate amount of business passing. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 20th inst. were returned as 5,062 bales. Total sales, 5,000 bales (includes 770 Soudan). Quotations are reduced 15 points, with the exception of Fair (in all qualities), which remains unchanged. Fully Good Fair Sakellaridis to-day, 15½d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Business still on Small Scale.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended July 28 states:—

There is no development to report during the past week, and business remains on an exceedingly small scale. The principal feature of interest has been the decided break in raw cotton prices in New York, resulting from a bout of selling which has taken place in that market, said to be mainly due to expectations of a crop large enough to remove the fear of any shortage for the time being. There is less talk here of artificial measures for buttressing the industry, and there is no doubt that prices are very gradually falling to the point at which the position will have remedied itself on sound economic lines.

Yarn.—Most spinners have experienced another disappointing week. Quotations are very patchy, with a falling tendency quite apart from the lower price of the raw material. The demand for yarn spun from Egyptian cotton, which had been of a much more encouraging character in previous weeks, has been less active in the past few days.

Cloth.—The lack of confidence in the stability of present quotations continues to act as a depressing factor, and a "hand to mouth" policy on the part of buyers is still in evidence. Turkey and the Levant have not yet responded to the better outlook due to the signature of peace at Lausanne, and only experience can show whether Lancashire will regain its former volume of business with these markets. India and China are disappointing, and the Home trade is quiet.

Raw Cotton.—As already mentioned, there has been a decided break in prices in New York. Liverpool has endeavoured to withstand this with a certain amount of success, the fall here not corresponding to that on the other side. It must, however, be recognised that the present tendency is in a downward direction. The next report of the American Agricultural Bureau is due on the 1st proximo, and is awaited with much interest. In the meantime unofficial advices report the lack of much needed rain in certain parts.

A duty of 15 drachmæ per metric ton has been imposed on coal imported into Greece. This duty is only to be levied under the "General" Tariff, and coal may continue to be admitted free of duty under the "Conventional" Tariff.

A revised and illustrated edition of Miss Florence B. Low's book, "Openings for British Women in Canada," has just been published by the Canadian Pacific Railway, 62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.1, from whom it may be obtained post free on application. The little volume deals with every phase of women's activity in the Dominion, and contains a fund of information as to the cost of living and existing conditions in Canada.

LONDON PRODUCE REPORT.

Oilseeds Weak.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

Sugar.—Home refined has continued in moderate request at unchanged prices. Tate's cubes have been done at 62s. 6d., London granulated has come to business at 58s. 1½d., while Lyle's granulated is 58s. 4½d. Foreign descriptions have been steady. White Java is 54s. 6d., Belgian granulated is 21s. 10½d., while Czech granulated is 22s.

Coffee.—A firm tone has prevailed, and in some cases quotations are harder. East Indian remains at 110s., Costa Rica is 2s. up at 102s., Nairobi has also gained 2s. at 90s., but Santos is 1s. down at 66s.

Rice.—This commodity has been steady, but business for the moment is very restricted. Supplies available are not very large and it would not be surprising if there were a further advance.

Dried Fruit.—The market position remains about the same. Currants have been in poor demand, and prices are rather easier. Stocks are none too extensive, however, and it would not take much buying to advance prices. Sultanas have been a good spot at slightly lower rates. Smyrna figs are in short supply, and prices have advanced.

Green Fruit.—The market for oranges continues to be very satisfactory, and it is very evident that the field for this fruit has widened considerably. There would seem to be little fear at present of the market being overstocked, as the fruit is moving off very well. Quotations: South Africans 23s. 6d. to 28s. 6d. box (96's to 288's). Lemons have been a weak spot, and prices have declined considerably. Quotations: 30s. to 35s. box (300's). Onions have been rather a variable market, Egyptians being lower.

Oilseeds.—Linseed has been rather weak, Indian being 19s. 3d., while La Plata is 18s. 6d. Rapeseed has been dull, with Toria at 15s. 9d. and real bold Ferozepore at 15s. Cottonseed has been easy. Indian is 9s. 3d. and Egyptian black 11s. 4½d.

Oils.—Linseed oil has been done at 41s. 6d. Rape oil has been weak, with crude at 39s. and technical refined at 42s. Cotton oil has been dull. Refined common edible is 44s., Egyptian crude is 38s. 6d., technical is 40s., while deodorised is 46s.

Oil Cakes.—The market has been quite firm. Linseed cake is unchanged at 212s. 6d., coconut cake remains at 165s., while cottonseed cake is the same at 147s. 6d.

AGRICULTURE IN IRAK.

The following extracts are taken from the Agricultural Bulletin of Irak for the period May 16 to June 15:—

A marked increase in the prevailing temperatures was noticeable during the period under review. The high temperatures were favourable to the maturing of cereals and also to the progress of the spring and summer crops. The cotton crop has benefited considerably, though the high winds prevailing in the second week of June induced a fair number of flower-buds to be shed. Stock generally is in good condition and relatively free from disease. The large areas inundated during the unusually high flood afford grazing which will be assured throughout the summer. Desert vegetation is now completely dry.

The condition of the date crop in the Basrah area is not as favourable as previously reported. The "Halawi" crop is now estimated as being considerably below that of last year; "Khadrawi" promises better than "Halawi," but below last year's yield; "Sayer" is estimated as an average crop. Later estimates will depend mainly on the incidence of insect pests and diseases, and also on the prevailing climatic conditions. The application of artificial manures experimentally to date palms is being repeated through the courtesy of the resident director of the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, who supplied the manures free of cost.

The total exports of cereals, 1922 crop, to the end of April was 163,181 tons. Except in parts of Upper Irak the current season's cereal crop is harvested. Threshing and winnowing are in progress. Small consignments of this latter crop are arriving in Basrah for export. Arrangements are being made for the transfer of the grain market from the port of Basrah to the rail-head at Margil, where the port authorities are making provision whereby the present handling charges will be considerably reduced. Efficient and economic cleaning machinery remains a necessity.

The condition of the cotton crop is good. A block of 460 acres at Felujah promises well. The first sowings on the estate of the Mosul Farms, Ltd., was destroyed by locusts: it has been resown. A keen demand for tractor ploughing on contract for cotton cultivation is anticipated for next season. Good progress has been made with silk work, which, as in the case of cotton work, is handicapped by a shortage of district subordinate staff. A reeling machine made locally at a cost of Rs. 90 is used for demonstration purposes at Muaddham, near Baghdad. Imported machines are in use at Baqubah. Large numbers of landowners and cultivators attend these demonstrations. Silk work has now arrived at that stage where commercial enterprise would find it profitable to erect filatures. The present departmental organisation permits of only a small proportion of the cocoons being reeled locally.

Progress in the Research Section continues satisfactorily. The Research Institute is nearing completion. All the Irak wheats under experiment have been discarded, as they are badly addicted to rust disease. Some of the imported Australian varieties show a marked superiority. It is noteworthy that over one ton of wheat per acre on relatively small plots has been obtained at the Experimental Farm, Rustam, without giving the crop any irrigation during its period of growth. Conservation of soil moisture contributed largely to this heavy yield, which was effected with a rainfall of 4.36 inches only. The farm crop of wheat and barley was cut by mechanical reapers, and a recently imported reaper and binder. With an efficient mechanical staff and a small workshop where petty repairs can be undertaken, these machines have proved their suitability even on irrigated lands. An all-steel combined thresher, straw-bruiser and chaff-cutter is doing satisfactory work.

The botanist and plant-breeder who has been responsible for cereal work has tendered his resignation from the service. His replacement is an urgent necessity. He has latterly been deputed to inquire into the administration of Sanniyah date-gardens in the Basrah Liwa.

Locusts in parts of Upper Irak were in flight by the second week in May. Large swarms are advancing on to the Dialah irrigated area, but fortunately most of the cereal crop is harvested, and the majority of the locusts have ceased feeding. The extent of the damage done to the current season's cereal crop in the unirrigated part of Upper Irak has not yet been estimated.

BEET SUGAR PROSPECTS IN CZECHO-SLOVAKIA.

The Acting Commercial Secretary at Prague has informed the Department of Overseas Trade that according to official figures a considerable increase in the area under beet cultivation in Czecho-Slovakia has taken place this year. This fact is of great importance to the sugar industry as, if the harvest is a favourable one, the sugar refineries will have at their disposal a considerably larger supply of beet than for many years past. The production will be more rational, and the costs of production, being divided up more uniformly, will be greatly reduced. All the Czecho-Slovak sugar factories have been established to handle large quantities of beet.

The prevailing crisis has been the cause of considerable difficulties to many factories, and several have been obliged temporarily to stop production. The situation during the war and during the years immediately following the Armistice, resulted in a decrease in the surface sown with beet. The home prices of cereals and other agricultural products being higher than those on the international market farmers ceased to be interested in the cultivation of the beet, which demands greater care and more trouble. To-day, however, the position is quite different. Owing to the fluctuations on the international market, and to the consequent uncertainty of what prices cereals will fetch, farmers have turned their attention again to the intensive culture of the beet, the price of which has been guaranteed to them by the negotiations which have taken place between them and the sugar producers.

After many years of stagnation, the surface under beet cultivation this year shows an appreciable increase, as can be seen from the following figures representing hectares (last year's figures being given in brackets):—Bohemia, 113,520 (96,151); Moravia, 68,490 (59,889); Silesia, 2,514 (2,163); Slovakia, 34,962 (26,388); total, 219,486 (184,591). The largest percentage increase is shown in Slovakia. This is explained by the fact that it was in Slovakia that the greatest reduction in beet-sowing took place. During the last pre-war campaign (1912-1913) the surface under beet amounted to 68,650 hectares; in 1919-1920 it had been reduced to 20,187 hectares, or scarcely one-third of the area sown in 1912-13. Taking Czecho-Slovakia as a whole, the increase over last year amounts to about one-fifth.

This year the sugar beet is well developed. It derives the nutritive elements for the development of the root from the atmosphere as well as from the sun. The development of the root, however, does not decide the value of the beet, but its value is judged according to its sugar contents, for which it is dependent upon heat and sun. Up to the end of June the beet suffered from lack of heat and sun, but if the hot weather which set in at the beginning of July continues there is every hope that this year's beet harvest will be satisfactory.

Although it is too early yet to predict the prospects of the coming season, there is every indication that it will be a favourable one, provided two-thirds of the production are allowed to be exported as already agreed upon, and the Government gives the industry a free hand. In view of a probable increase in production, foreign buyers have already shown a great interest in the quantity of sugar likely to be available in Czecho-Slovakia. Czecho-Slovakia is, however, not the only country in which an increase in the area under beet cultivation has taken place. In other European countries, with the exception of Germany, the surface has also been increased.

The Czecho-Slovak Railways are granting a 50 per cent. reduction of freights on samples sent to the Prague Fair.

After passing a Bill on July 25 to insure the coming harvest against damage by hail, the Serbian National Assembly adjourned until September 20.

Roumanian crops are satisfactory, and considerable grain exports are probable. Favourable weather assists the threshing. Rail and river transport is already being prepared for the export of grain during August.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

NEW ELLERMAN LINER.

The trials took place, on July 20, of the finely modelled steamer City of Athens, built by Messrs. Wm. Gray and Co. of West Hartlepool, for the Ellerman Lines, Ltd. The main dimensions of the vessel are: Length, overall, 450 ft. 9 in.; breadth, extreme, 57 ft. 5 in.; and depth moulded to upper deck 32 ft. 10 in., with a d.w. of about 10,600 tons. The approximate gross tonnage is about 6,600. The double bottom tanks are arranged for the carriage of oil fuel, and steam pipes are fitted round the tank sections to liquefy the heavy oil. The vessel is of the two-deck type with bridge and forecastle decks combined and poop. Up-to-date arrangements are provided for the handling of cargo, twelve winches and sixteen derricks being fitted for this purpose.

Spacious accommodation is provided in steel houses, on the bridge deck, for the officers and engineers, the captain being accommodated in a steel house above. Accommodation is provided in the poop for forty firemen, and twenty-four seamen are housed in steel houses on the poop deck. The steering gear of the Wilson-Pirrie type, is placed in a large steel house on the poop deck, and is worked by telemotor from the navigating bridge. The vessel is installed throughout with electric light.

The propelling machinery, made by the Central Marine Engine works of the builders, consists of a set of triple-expansion engines with cylinders 28 in., 45 in., 78 in. diameter by 54 in. stroke, and three large boilers adapted for a working pressure of 250 lb. per square inch, and fitted with Howden's system of forced draught. A large number of "C. M. E. W." steamship auxiliaries, also made by the Central Marine Engine Works, are included in the machinery installation. The vessel and machinery have been built under the superintendence of Mr. Alexander Dalrymple.

THE SHIPPING EXHIBITION.

This year's Shipping Exhibition, which opens on August 31 at Olympia, promises to be a very notable event. One of the features of the exhibition will be the display of marine internal combustion engines, and machinery generally will be very much to the fore. Special interest is likely to be aroused by the varied exhibits of machinery for handling cargo that will be on view, while the section devoted to refrigerating machinery will, it is understood, contain new systems of installation.

SPECIAL MARKET REPORTS.

Nablus, June 30.

The market remains quiet. The export of soap to Cairo continues, but the prices are low and a large stock remains unsold.

Haifa, June 30.

The grain market has opened, and business has been fairly regular. Prices, after many fluctuations, have closed with a weak tendency. Transactions have been normal, but there has been no special eagerness on the part of buyers.

BULGARIAN DEBT SERVICE.

The Bulgarian Government announces that it is prepared to pay to British bondholders the Coupon No. 33 of the Bulgarian Four and a-Half per Cent. Loan of 1907, maturing on August 1, 1923, at francs (French) 11.25 each, and the bonds drawn for redemption on that date at francs (French) 500 each.

Holders of bonds which have been in British ownership since August 1, 1914, who are desirous of availing themselves of the offer should present the coupons and drawn bonds (to which all coupons due after the date of redemption must remain attached) for payment at the counting-house of Messrs. Stern Brothers, 6, Angel Court, E.C.2, between the hours of 11 a.m. and 2 p.m. (Saturdays excepted).

The amount due in French francs will be paid in sterling at the sight rate of exchange on Paris on the day of presentation, less income-tax. All bonds and coupons, together with such verifications of ownership as may be required, must be left seven clear days for examination.

ROUMANIA'S TAXES.

In the House of Commons, on July 30, Brigadier-General Spears asked the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs if he was aware that the Roumanian Government levied a special tax on foreign holders of Roumanian securities, and that this tax applied to money invested in Roumania before the law imposing the tax was passed; and would he consider making representations to the Roumanian Government in the interest of British holders of Roumanian investments, and also consulting with other Governments whose nationals were affected concerning this matter.

Mr. McNeill: The honourable and gallant member is presumably referring to the Roumanian law for the unification of direct taxation, Article 22 of which gives preferential treatment as regards taxation to the shares of joint stock companies whose capital is in the majority Roumanian. Strong representations have already been made to the Roumanian Government on more than one occasion upon this vexatious discrimination, but hitherto without effect.

CLAIMS AGAINST TURKEY.

Replying in Parliament on July 30 to Mr. Harris, Mr. McNeill said: Under Article 58 of the Peace Treaty signed at Lausanne on July 24, 1923, Turkey and the other signatory Powers (except Greece) agreed reciprocally to renounce all claims for reparations. By the same Article Turkey renounced all claim to £5,000,000 Turkish in gold transferred to the Allies under the treaties with Germany and Austria. It is intended to apply this gold to the payment of claims against Turkey by Allied nationals.

Stock and Share Markets.

EFFECT OF POLITICAL SITUATION.

Oil Shares Depressed.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

The markets have not derived the slightest assistance so far from the signing of the Treaty of Lausanne. That fact speaks volumes as to the present position. The truth is that the markets to-day are overshadowed by the European political situation, and until that is cleared up it is hopeless to look for any real measure of improvement. It is, in short, Reparations to-day, just as it has been for so many weary months. Still, while the Turkish settlement has had no visible effect, its moral effect is very evident, for people very reasonably argue that if after such a long period of disappointment it has been possible to reach an agreement something of the same kind will be the ultimate outcome of the Ruhr impasse. The universal hope is that it will not be long delayed, for, as the Prime Minister pointed out, we are beginning to feel the effects of the position, and our experience of the trade depression has been quite profound enough for the statement that things may be worse in the winter to cause something akin to a feeling of alarm. Unfortunately, that is inevitable if the Allies cannot bring about a settlement with Germany. It is not surprising in the circumstances that the stock markets should be dull. At the present time, in fact, they are an apt reflection of the trade outlook. Once the bugbear of Reparations is out of the way there will be a swift change to buoyant markets, for everything is ripe for a real trade revival if only the conditions will permit it.

Gilt-Edged Dull.

Gilt-edged securities have held up fairly well in the face of adverse influences, but a rather dull note was in evidence yesterday. Consols are 58¾, War Loan Fives are 100¾, the Conversion Loan is 78⅝, while Fundings are 91⅛. Indian stocks have been steady, with the Seven per Cent. Loan at 118 and the Three per Cent. Loan at 59¼. The Sudan 5½ per Cent. Loan is 107½, while the 4½ per Cent. Loan is 95.

Foreign Government securities have made a very variable showing. French stocks have been dull, the Five per Cents. being 27, while the Four per Cents. are 21½. Italian Rentes are now 19½, while German Three per Cents. have eased off a little to 14s. In Near Eastern securities Turkish Unified have been very flat, closing at 19½. Greek stocks have been fairly firm, Monopolies being 41½, while the 1889 Loan is 47.

Industrials Dull.

There has been very little doing in the Industrial group. Business has been on the most restricted scale, and price movements have not been of any great moment. While there have been a few good features, in the main the changes have been in the downward direction. Textiles have been rather variable. Coats are 69s., while Courtaulds are 60s. 7½d. Tobaccos have shown considerable firmness. Bats are 98s. 6d., while Imperial Tobaccos are 70s. 6d. Iron and Steel shares have been inactive. Vickers are 13s., Armstrong are 16s. 6d., and Guest Keen are 41s. 6d. There have been no special movements in the Shipping section. P. and O. Deferred are 315, Furness Withys are 28s. 6d., while Cunards are 18s. 6d. In the Miscellaneous section Sudan Pantations have been a good spot, closing at 5 7-16. I shall not be surprised if this share goes higher in the near future.

Oils Depressed.

The Oil market is still going through a period of acute depression. It is particularly susceptible to the foreign political situation, and it is therefore not to be wondered at that prices are lower. During the past week there has been a certain amount of liquidation in the market, which has brought about renewed weakness. Burmahs have been fairly steady, closing at 4 9-16, while Anglo-Persian Ordinary are 3 3-16. Mexican Eagles have been particularly weak, and are down to 19s. 6d., Shells are 3¼, while Lobitos are 5⅝. In the Trinidad group Centrals are 9-16, Leaseholds are 1 11-32, while Apex are 2 7-32. Among Egyptians, Anglo-Egyptian B are 1 3-32, while Gemsah Oil Reefs are 11-16. Roumanians have generally been dull. Phœnix are 15-16, Steaua Romanas are 8s., Dacia Romanos are 13-16, while Hamilton's Oil Concessions are 1s. 6d. Looking at the list, one can only come to the conclusion that if ever bargains are to be obtained in the market it is now. Phœnix and Steaua Romanas look particularly tempting. It has, however, to be borne in mind that a continuance of the present uncertainty on the Continent will probably mean lower prices.

Rubbers Reviving.

The Rubber market always seems to go by opposites. When other markets are dull it revives, and vice versa. Now at long last there are unmistakable signs of activity, and the shares have begun to advance a little. Everything pointed to this as inevitable. The price of the commodity has been very firm of late, and stocks have been diminishing steadily. It would seem probable that we shall now witness a prolonged period of steadily advancing prices.

The duty on barley exported from Yugoslavia has been reduced from 100 to 40 dinars per 100 kilogrammes.

Sir James McKecknie, K.B.E., has resigned his position as managing director of the Barrow Naval Construction Works of Vickers, Ltd. He will, however, retain his seat on the board of directors of the Vickers Company. Commander K. W. Craven will be in charge of Barrow works.

A Difficult Period.

Hope for Quietness and Stability.

The annual general meeting of the shareholders of the Imperial Ottoman Bank was held on July 25 at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C.

The Viscount Goschen, C.B.E., presided.

The Secretary (Mr. Charles E. L. Corthorn) having read the notice convening the meeting,

The Chairman said: Ladies and Gentlemen,—I have been informed that this meeting is properly constituted. I presume that it will be your pleasure that the report and accounts, as printed and circulated among you, shall be taken as read.

In moving the adoption of the report and accounts, I would like to say a few words. The period for 1922 has again been beset with difficulties of every kind. The general depression in trade did not abate, and the momentous events which occurred in the Near East also had their effect on our affairs.

The Greco-Turkish War.

During the first months of the year the Allied Governments made a sincere effort to put an end to the war between Turkey and Greece. For a time hope revived, and the hopo sufficed to restore initiative; but the negotiations had no result. Military operations, which had been virtually suspended, were resumed with increased activity in August. On September 9 Smyrna was entered by the Turks. On October 11 an armistice was signed at Mudania, and on November 20 the Peace Conference opened at Lausanne.

The military operations, the devastations in the war zone, the burning of Smyrna, and the fear of political complications, all had the most unfortunate economic results, and during the second half of the year business languished more and more.

In Constantinople the monetary tightness, the new Customs regulations, and the difficulty of communicating with Anatolia, contributed further to discourage trade. Meanwhile Southern Russia reduced its purchases on the market of Constantinople, and importers limited their transactions to foodstuffs and articles of prime necessity.

Great quantities of produce perished in the fire at Smyrna, but exports showed an increase. The foreign demand for tobacco, mohair, and silk was active enough to outpace production and to exhaust existing stocks.

Figures for the commercial movement of Turkey are only available for the first nine months of 1922. Imports stand at 59,341,571 Turkish pounds, as against 85,258,260 for the corresponding period in 1921. Exports reached 23,254,327 Turkish pounds, as against 9,841,109 for the preceding year. The deficit on the commercial balance for this period has therefore been reduced from 75,417,151 Turkish pounds to 36,087,244. In spite of this situation, the rate of exchange did not improve. In December, 1921, the pound sterling stood at about 700 piastres. Last December it closed at 800, after having reached the figure of 1,000 piastres in the early days of November. The instability of the rate compelled merchants to observe great caution and increased the stagnation.

Ottoman Public Debt.

The net receipts of the Administration of the Ottoman Public Debt for 1921-1922 amounted to 7,641,312 Turkish pounds. For 1922-23 the Council of the Debt estimates that they will not amount to more than 6,262,000 Turkish pounds, owing to the fact that for this period they will be deprived of the revenue of three more districts of Anatolia. In 1922 the Administration of the Ottoman Public Debt and the Ottoman Government proceeded to the distribution of the provisions which existed for the service of the Unified Debt and of various Turkish Loans, for the period from March, 1915, to September, 1922. The payments on account were made for the Turkish Unified Debt in July and September for the Loans outside the Decree in March and October, 1922.

At Constantinople the various branches of our activity maintained their normal progress during the first six months and showed satisfactory results. The events of the second half-year, however, had a serious effect on the volume of our operations, not only in Constantinople, but particularly in Smyrna, and in the devastated regions of Asia Minor. It will be recalled that the building occupied by our Agency in Smyrna was destroyed in the fire. The cash was saved, the safes containing the securities remained intact, and the actual damage was covered by insurance policies taken out to cover all risks. Measures were immediately taken to reopen the Agency, which has been installed in a new building. On the other hand, events have compelled us to close our Agencies in various towns for the time being.

Eastern Branches.

The business of our branches in Palestine, Mesopotamia, Cyprus and Egypt has been affected by the general state of stagnation in the business world; in Greece this stagnation has been particularly marked. In the course of the year we opened an office at Nablous (Palestine) and founded a new Persian branch in Teheran.

The development of our affairs in London and Paris continues steadily, and our agencies in Manchester, Marseilles, and Tunis await with confidence the revival of commercial relations with the East, which may be expected to follow the conclusion of peace.

Turning now to the institutions in which we have a definite interest; our filiale, the Banque de Syrie, has had to face a diminution of commerce in Syria and the Lebanon. Nevertheless, it has been able to constitute considerable reserves and to pay a dividend for 1922 of 5 per cent. The Banque Franco-Serbe, in which we have an important interest, has been engaged in consolidating its situation after the war. The Bank of Roumania finds itself in a satisfactory position.

It is a matter of considerable interest to our establishment that the great public enterprises in Turkey should prosper—railways, quays, tramways, electricity, and mines. At present these are all in process of reorganisation and adaptation to the changed conditions, economic and financial, which have followed the war. It is sincerely to be hoped that the negotiations now proceeding with the Turkish Government will place these concerns in a position to develop their usefulness with profit to the country.

The Balance Sheet.

With reference to the balance-sheet: as is shown in the report, the assets and liabilities in foreign currencies have been converted into sterling at the rates ruling on December 31 last—so far as francs are concerned—at the rate of 64f. to the pound sterling, as against 52f. on December 31 of the previous year. The accounts made up to December 31, 1922, after providing for bad and doubtful debts out of revenue, and provisions previously made, show an amount available of £194,693 8s. 10d., including the sum of £18,553 3s. 7d. brought forward from the previous year. This result cannot fail to be regarded as satisfactory, taking into consideration the unfavourable circumstances under which it has been accomplished.

In consequence of the uncertainty of the situation throughout the world, and chiefly on account of fluctuations in the exchanges, which affect existing balances in foreign currencies—the franc exchange having already fluctuated this year between 64 and 79.50 to the pound sterling—we can only propose that this balance should be carried forward. We have no doubt that you will approve of this policy, dictated by prudence, which will have the effect of strengthening the bank's situation, in view not only of the contingencies to which I have referred, but also of such developments as may attend the conclusion of peace. This peace has now been achieved. I express the hope that it will bring quietness and stability to the East. A prudent

Government Administration and a collaboration of all interests can now make possible for Turkey an era of prosperity which will permit the development of its native wealth. For such a future we are prepared.

The members of our staff in Asia Minor have again found themselves in a situation of great delicacy and, at times, of danger. We address to them all a message of sympathy, with our thanks to the directions of Constantinople, London, Paris, and other agencies, and from the bank to all other members of our staff for their unsparing efforts during this period of stress.

FURNESS, WITHY, AND CO.

The Trade Outlook.

The thirty-second annual general meeting of Furness, Withy, and Company, Limited, was held on July 26, at the registered office of the company, Furness House, Leadenhall Street, E.C. Sir Frederick W. Lewis, Bart., presided.

The Secretary read the notice convening the meeting; Mr. Ralph T. Warwick, of Messrs. W. T. Walton and Son, read the auditors' report.

Sir Frederick W. Lewis, Bart., in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that those of them who had any knowledge of the shipping industry in particular, and trading conditions generally, would not be surprised to see that the profits were reduced by £102,696 1s. 3d. It would probably be a gratification to them, as it was to the directors, that the falling off of the profits had not been greater. The outlook being so uncertain and unsatisfactory, the directors very reluctantly have decided they would be lacking in prudence if they continued to distribute the same sum in dividend and bonus as has been their custom for the past seven years. The reduction in profits represented 2½ per cent. of their ordinary capital, and he would ask them to approve of the customary 5 per cent. bonus being reduced to half that amount. Nevertheless, this would make a distribution for the year of 7½ per cent., free of income-tax, which under all circumstances, he was sure the shareholders would regard as satisfactory. They could, of course, have maintained their bonus at the sacrifice of their depreciation or carry-forward, and whilst their assets all stood in their books at a satisfactory figure, they felt that every prudent board of directors should strive under all circumstances to set aside something to their reserves. They were, therefore, going to ask them to authorise them to apply £200,000 of their profits to depreciation and to carry forward an amount of £202,315 12s. 11d., which in itself was equal to over 5 per cent. of the ordinary share capital of the company, and their reserve fund, as they knew, stood at £2,000,000, equivalent to one-half of their ordinary capital.

As was the case last year, a very small proportion of their profits was derived from steamers that they owned. The trading conditions had so reflected themselves upon the rates of freight that it was only with the utmost difficulty that expenses could be paid, and even then, in order to avoid loss greater than the cost of laying up, it had been necessary for them, in common with other shipping companies, to lay up a proportion of their own and associated tonnage.

If there should fortunately be any considerable revival in the shipping trade he could say without the slightest hesitation that their company was as well equipped and as firmly established as it ever had been, and they had resources at their disposal that would enable them to take the fullest advantage of any improvement.

He was sorry to say he could not hold out any very encouraging hopes of substantial improvement as regards their current financial year, one-quarter of which had already passed. They were unfortunately more or less helpless in bringing about any trade revival. The only thing they could do, as he had repeatedly pointed out, was to concentrate their energies in reducing expenditure.

They all deplored the strike that had recently broken out amongst the dockers, and in this connection two thoughts readily occurred to his mind:—1st: In all matters relating to employers and employed, the absolute necessity for re-recognising the sanctity of contracts, and, 2nd, the remorseless logic of foreign competition. It was, of course, a lamentable fact, which he was sure no one regretted more than the employers themselves, that the dockers' employment was of a casual nature, and this was unfortunately emphasised by the existing trade conditions. As a matter of fact, this also applied to the trading of ships, as nothing could be more casual than the employment of shipping at the present time. The tonnage laid up at the thirty-six principal ports of the United Kingdom on July 1 amounted to 712,000 net tons, as compared with 546,555 net tons on April 1 last. Unless there was an unforeseen improvement, he very much feared that that figure would be still further increased.

That brought them to the second point he had mentioned—namely, the remorseless logic of foreign competition. It was only cumulative reduction in costs that could in the long run lead to a greater volume and flow of traffic. It seemed to be a fact that in those industries in this country that came into direct competition with foreign nations the economic necessity for lower wages had been more quickly realised. The dockers did not come into direct competition with foreign labour, and therefore the relative rate of wages was higher.

In conclusion, their organisations throughout the whole world were keen and enthusiastic—so much so that he should not like to let that opportunity pass without putting on record the board's appreciation of the work of the staffs during the past difficult and trying year.

The report was unanimously adopted.

EGYPTIAN DELTA LIGHT RAILWAYS.

Causes of Decrea ed Traffic.

The twenty-sixth ordinary general meeting of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways, Ltd., was held on July 27 at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C., Sir Montagu Sharpe, K.C. (chairman of the company), presiding.

The Secretary (Mr. F. J. Horne) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that their earnings for the year ended March 31, 1923, aggregated £343,792, as compared with £396,658 for the previous year, a decrease of £52,866. With regard to the passenger traffic, the total number of passengers carried was 4,790,814, as compared with 5,590,001 for the previous year, a reduction of 799,187 (the principal decrease being in third-class passengers), the receipts being £210,562 for the year under review, as compared with £249,643 for the previous year, a decrease of £39,081. That continued decrease in earnings had caused them much anxiety, and no effort had been spared to investigate the causes which had brought about this situation, on which they were in constant communication with their agent and general manager in Egypt.

There was no question, in his opinion, that the fundamental reason for that regrettable state of affairs was the extreme poverty of the fellaheen, upon whom they relied for their third-class passenger traffic. The fellah was largely dependent upon the cotton crops and upon the market price of the cotton. During 1922 the crop yield throughout the provinces in Lower Egypt, which their lines served, was unusually poor.

Another reason for the decline in passenger traffic was the competition from the large increase in the number of private and Government cars in the districts. This particularly affected their first-class traffic, as many private individuals and most Government officials who previously used trains now travelled by motor-car. Efforts were made to meet this competition by reducing rates, but this was met by corresponding reductions in the fares charged by the motor-cars, and resulted in a falling off in their receipts.

As he had already mentioned, the principal reason for the reduced passenger traffic receipts was the poverty of the fellaheen, and it was obvious that to meet that evil some method must be adopted which would enable them to carry them at sufficiently low rates to meet their pockets and also to supply the necessity for a more frequent service.

For the purpose of thoroughly discussing this question and to decide upon the best course to pursue, their agent and general manager in Egypt was recently called to London to confer with the board, with the result that, after carefully considering the subject from all points of view in light of the reports presented by him, the directors were unanimously of the opinion that the objective could only be attained by the introduction of a form of light rail motor-coaches, accommodating thirty to forty passengers, which would enable them to run a more frequent and economical service and to reduce fares to the necessary level. Steps were now being taken to purchase at once three such vehicles as an experimental measure. If this was successful, it was proposed to extend the service to other sections of the line where it was likely to prove remunerative.

Now, with regard to their goods traffic, they had, in self-protection against competition and to induce a freer movement of goods over their lines, been compelled, in common with other railways in Egypt, to reduce their tariffs for certain commodities, principally cotton and cotton seed. As a result they carried 422,909 tons as compared with 412,015 tons during the preceding year, an increase of 10,894 tons. Notwithstanding this increase in tonnage, their earnings showed a decrease of £12,911, being £124,650 as compared with £137,561.

With regard to expenditure, they had fortunately succeeded in reducing the aggregate by £37,270; that was to say, from £296,986 for the year ended March 31, 1922, to £259,716 for the year under review.

He would now turn to the net revenue account. The balance shown on that account as carried forward was £103,230 4s. 1d. If the balance brought in from the previous year, amounting to £61,649 19s. 5d., was deducted, it left a balance of £41,580 4s. 8d., which was their total net revenue for the year available for distribution, including interest on investments, deposits, etc., and the amount refunded by the Egyptian Government on account of interest on investments paid to the Government during the four years ended March 31, 1921.

It was unnecessary for him to reiterate the remarks he made at the last general meeting in connection with their financial position, and the need for conserving their resources for capital expenditure. This position was practically unchanged, and he might remind them that he then also expressed the opinion that the traffics were "not sufficiently encouraging to lead them to hope for anything but a lean year."

Unfortunately, that forecast had materialised; but as they had for all practical purposes earned sufficient to pay again a dividend of 4 per cent. on the preference share capital, which would absorb £41,631 4s., they had decided, after careful consideration of all the circumstances, to recommend that that should be done.

The resolution was seconded by Sir W. E. Garstin, and was carried unanimously.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Imperial Ottoman Bank.

The report of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for 1922 states that in the preparation of the balance-sheet assets and liabilities in foreign currency have been converted into sterling at the rates ruling at December 31, 1922. The accounts, after providing for bad and doubtful debts out of revenue and provisions previously made, show an amount available of £194,693 6s. 10d., including £18,553 3s. 7d. brought forward. In view of the present situation, the committee recommend that this amount be carried forward.

Steaua Romana.

The Steaua Romana, Bucharest, announces that the dividend for the year 1922 has been fixed at 50 per cent., or 250 lei per share. With the Roumanian tax deducted, the dividend will amount to 217.50 lei, which will be paid on or after August 7 on presentation of coupon No. 20 at the offices of Messrs. Stern Brothers, 6, Angel Court, E.C.2.

At an extra-ordinary meeting on July 7 it was decided to increase the capital from 310,000,000 lei to 465,000,000 lei by the creation of 310,000 shares of 500 lei each. The shares are offered to present holders at a premium of 50 lei, in the proportion of one new share for every two held, no account being taken of fractions. Subscriptions will be opened on August 7 and will close on August 31.

Indo-Burma Oilfields.

The directors of the Indo-Burma Oilfields (1920), Ltd., have issued to shareholders copies of a report by Mr. A. W. Ibbett, who was commissioned by the board to visit and report on the properties and organisation in Burma, and a geological report by Dr. Murray Stuart, the company's chief geologist, on the company's Okpon area. Mr. Ibbett is of opinion that, while there has been considerable success in the shallow wells, bigger production will eventually be found at depth, and he forecasts that within a short time daily production and sales will rather more than balance expenses. Dr. Stuart concludes that the report on the Okpon concession made by Mr. H. J. Davies in 1921 is substantially correct, and he is of the opinion that the geological structure of Okpon promises better than that of Padaukpin.

TYPEWRITERS IN TURKEY.

The typewriter was introduced into Constantinople some forty years ago, but it made slow progress during the reign of Abdul Hamid, because the people were taught that the typewriter was an "unholy" mechanism. But with the advent of the Constitutional régime, after the revolution of 1908, ancient prejudices were gradually dissipated, and in the course of time (says an American Consular report) a growing demand for the typewriter began to be felt. During the late war, the Turkish Government required that correspondence with its various departments be carried on in Turkish, and the typewriter was consequently adapted to that language. Machines were sold at abnormally high prices because of the impossibility of getting new stocks from England and the United States, owing to the closing of the Dardanelles. German firms at that time enjoyed direct connections with Turkey, and among other makes, the Continental, Adler, Mercedes, and Torpedo typewriters were successfully introduced on the Turkish market. The period immediately following the Armistice was exceptionally prosperous for the business people of Constantinople and other ports of Turkey, and the typewriter began to play an important part in expediting commercial affairs. About 1,000 typewriters of American manufacture were imported into Constantinople during 1920, besides a considerable number of calculating machines, filing cabinets, and other office appliances. However, when the economic crisis set in during the autumn of 1920, continuing during 1921 and 1922, numerous Constantinople concerns liquidated their business and withdrew from the city. These firms disposed of their office equipment at exceedingly low prices, and the market was somewhat flooded with typewriters. Local sales of typewriters during 1922 were estimated at approximately one-half of those in 1920, or about 500, at prices varying between 150 and 180 Turkish pounds.

The official full-speed trial of the steel oil-tank steamer San Quirino, built by Sir W. G. Armstrong, Whitworth and Co., Ltd., for the Eagle Oil Transport Company, took place on July 18 with satisfactory results.

We are informed that the appeal made on behalf of the Royal Alfred Institution for Aged Seamen is meeting with a generous response. Donations ranging from as little as 3d. to several hundreds of pounds have been received, although one or two replies have stated that the heavy burden of taxation operates against a larger contribution

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Angora and its Responsibilities.

Closer investigation of the actualities of peace is helping to convince the Turks that the difficult period in the building of a new Turkey is ahead of them. Mustapha Kemal Pasha is reported to have summoned the Deputies of his Popular Party to a preliminary meeting at Angora this week with a view to drawing up a Parliamentary programme. Proposals for important modifications in the Law of the Constitution are expected, and among these may be one designed to abolish by degrees the present system under which all Ministers are elected by the Assembly without reference to the wishes of the one selected by the same body as Prime Minister. It is on the whole a good sign that already part of the system which, under the prompting of its Moscow friends, seemed a little while ago ideal to Angora, is being found to be unworkable, or, at least, prejudicial to good government in Turkey. The problem of an Assembly which is at once a legislative and an executive body is not likely to be approached at present. The new Deputies will find the exercise of power pleasant, and it may need a movement from outside to convince them that the existing scheme is unworkable.

The Deportations.

In the economic sphere there are signs that the mistake made in deporting Greeks from Asia Minor is already being appreciated. Turks, it is stated, are untrained for building and carpentry; but the Greek skilled workmen in these trades have been expelled from Asia Minor. Turkish contractors, therefore, are reduced to trying to recruit Greek masons and others in Constantinople. Similarly, in other branches of industry the absence of the Greek worker is being felt acutely. It may take time for this state of affairs to reach a stage at which the Turkish authorities are compelled to take notice of it, and it will certainly be better that the Turks should find it out for themselves, and not have the matter even indirectly made a political question. The exchange of populations has been agreed to and must be carried out as best it may. The Turks will not modify their programme to please foreigners; only when they realise that a change is necessary in their own interests will they begin to think of allowing deported Greeks to return. A far more pressing problem is that of the refugees, who have hitherto been maintained at the expense of various relief organisations. The chief fund raised for the purpose—that of the American Near East Relief—is now exhausted, and there is nothing to take its place. Negotiations on the subject between Greece and Turkey are not likely to lead to any practical result in time to save the lives of the unfortunate refugees.

Bulgaria and the Ægean.

Reference is made elsewhere in this issue to Mr. Ronald McNeill's letter to The Times on the subject of Bulgaria's claims to an outlet on the Ægean Sea; but, as the question is one of the most important in Near Eastern politics, too much attention can hardly be devoted to it. Just as it would have been more sensible from the Allies' point of view, and much more convenient, if the Turks had accepted the Treaty of Sèvres without demur, so the Bulgarians must expect harsh words for not falling in at once with what the Allies consider to be good for them. "It is entirely owing to the conduct of the Bulgarians themselves, who overreached themselves during the negotiations," writes Mr. McNeill, "that they did not secure more favourable conditions." Even those more favourable conditions, however, would have fallen short of what the Bulgarians regard as essential for their future development. There may have been an error in tactics on the part of the Bulgarian delegation at Lausanne in trying to induce the Conference to travel by easy stages the whole distance that they wished to take it, instead of naming their goal at the outset and adhering to it; but the mistake may have been prompted solely by a diffidence that was entirely correct. The root of the trouble lies in the decision of the Supreme Council to shut off Bulgaria from the Ægean Sea, and then in the attempt of the Allies to see how little can be granted to the Bulgarians with a view to glossing over the mistake. If the matter is to be regulated by the policy of punishment, then Bulgaria should be penalised without mitigating conditions. Clause 48 of the Treaty of Neuilly should not have been inserted, and the future of the Near East must be allowed to take care of itself. If, on the other hand, the history of the last five years is a standing warning against the attempt to base any settlement on vindictiveness, and the Lausanne Conference implied an effort on the part of the Allies to undo some, at least, of the more glaring mistakes made by the Supreme Council, then there is no justification for half measures, and the policy of taking from Bulgaria an Ægean seaboard ought to be jettisoned without further ado.

Yugoslav Politics.

The reconstruction of the Yugoslav Cabinet does not represent an attempt to hold out an olive branch to the Federalists. The three new Ministers are not only Radicals, but also Serbians. In the face of the Opposition's tactics, no other course may have been open to M. Pashitch; but it can hardly fail to make the position of his Government still more difficult in view of the fact that he commands little more than a third of the votes of the Skupshtina. It may be that M. Pashitch, who is no believer in passive tactics, hopes that by means of an attack on the Raditch stronghold he will be able to mould Yugoslav politics on more practical lines. Ever since the Constitution became law there has been a political deadlock. Hopes were entertained a few months ago of an understanding between the Radical Party and the Croatians, but these have been wrecked on the intransigence of M. Raditch. M. Pashitch's fighting instinct may prompt him to think that the time to show himself conciliatory towards the federal idea will be when M. Raditch is out of his way. Some modification of the existing Constitution seems inevitable, if Yugoslavia is to settle down to a normal constitutional existence.

Lord Reading and the Cabinet.

The cable is not an unmixed blessing, and an unfortunate impression was undoubtedly produced in this country by the transmission of some detached phrases from Lord Reading's recent speech, suggesting that on the question of Kenya the Government of India had taken an inaccurate view of its position in relation to the Cabinet. Viscount Peel has been at pains to remove this impression by a statement in the House of Lords, supplemented by the circulation of extracts from the speech, and his efforts may fairly be described as successful. Lord Reading, in fact, insisted at some length on the correct constitutional doctrine, which Indian politicians so rarely mention, of the sovereignty of Parliament, and, if he used one or two unfortunate phrases, they must be interpreted in the light of the speech taken as a whole. The Viceroy's position is undoubtedly difficult. His essential duty is to carry out the orders of the Cabinet, but he has to live with a Legislature which would like to take over some of the Cabinet's most important functions, and with politicians who are apt to treat phrases like inconvertible currency, obtainable in any quantity on demand. It is all the more necessary that the authorities should be careful to maintain a due relation between the paper in circulation and the reserve of fact on which it is based.

The Weakness of India.

Discussions on the position of Indians in Kenya continued last week, but nothing new was said, and the most interesting item was the report of speeches made at a private gathering, at which Mr. Srinivasa Sastri and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru reiterated the demand for Dominion status as the only safeguard for India against treatment such as that which they resent. The aspiration is entirely legitimate, but we should like to ask these two gentlemen, between whom the leadership of the new India seems to lie, what practical steps they or their followers are taking to bring it within reach. They must realise that a democratic franchise is the first condition precedent, seeing that Parliament is not out to establish oligarchies: what are they doing to make it possible to enfranchise the pariahs and outcasts, or even the bulk of the peasants, who must own and work the Dominion when it comes? They assert that India is politically weak: what measures are they taking to lay the foundations of greater strength in the only possible position—the hearts and minds of the masses of the people? The work will take some time; but that is all the more reason why it should be put in hand at once.

Calcutta's Houses.

Recent news suggests that the inhabitants of Calcutta are at last becoming seriously perturbed over the housing question. The topic is, of course, no novelty, for people have been grumbling for a great many years, and an Improvement Trust has been at work since Lord Minto's time; but citizens have been apathetic, powers and resources have been limited, and ground landlords, it is whispered, have occasionally been obstructive, so that, while much has been accomplished, things have on balance got worse instead of better. How bad they are may be inferred from the statement of the Englishman that the immediate problem is not one of relieving discomfort, but of saving people from being killed, and it appears to us that the time is ripe for the application of some of that vigorous driving-power which Sir George Lloyd has been employing in Bombay. Sir George was, of course, fortunate in being able to build in the sea, while the coming saviour of Calcutta may be driven to the swamps; but the task before him, though it is very difficult, is not impossible, and the sooner it is tackled seriously the better.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

The Holiday.

The Bank Holiday was for London a perfect one. Undeterred by newspaper talk of depressions off the West Coast of Ireland, or some other wild, forgotten spot, Londoners marched on all three days out into the open air, and enjoyed themselves in the intensive way which only they can command. By all routes they flocked out of London, and if the exodus was not a record, one would be surprised, for never do there seem to have been so many people on the roads. They gave themselves completely up to gaiety, leaving the Ruhr and Lausanne and the future of Mr. McKenna a thousand radiant miles away. To-morrow morning, it is true, the city air may be full of passionate regrets and heavy with sore heads, but to-day it has all undoubtedly been gloriously worth it.

But while Londoners fled in the sunshine to the fields, our woolly provincials came up stolidly and so contentedly to gaze at what the Cockneys left to them. There are, it seems, people from Wales and the North brave and original enough to enter places like the British Museum and the Zoo on Bank Holidays; and no doubt they, in their curious inversion of values, enjoy such things. But for London the holiday was a call to the sun and the moon and the half-light, and all but the very old and very young and very wise obeyed it.

England and France.

November. For both in the Lords and in the Commons the dark question of the Ruhr had been debated, and of any definite action on the part of the British Government neither Lord Curzon in the one place nor the Prime Minister in the other could give any hint. The British questionnaire had, it appeared, been disregarded by both the French and the Belgian Governments, and the only hope that we could have lay in the publication of the different Allied Government's views.

The Government, then, is not hopeful. Nor were its critics, of whom none (unless one mentions Lord Birkenhead, across whose bright intellect dashed the suggestion of the withdrawal of British troops from Germany) had anything constructive to offer. Very few people, in fact, can see anything that might helpfully be done; and the only class of opinion which commands any direct respect is that which favours immediate identification of British with French policy.

It is in some ways a lamentable fact, because it plays straight into the hands of men who are neither straight nor patriotic, that many Englishmen view the question of Reparations, and indeed, the whole question of Europe's future, solely from the business point of view. They are oppressed by the magnitude of our unemployment problem, and their sympathy is with the Government when it tells them that the occupation of the Ruhr can do little but increase the size of that problem. They do not greatly relish the idea of a return by Germany to commercial prosperity, but fear that our own trade security is incomplete without it.

But, looking at the matter from a wider point of view, one can see no possible policy of any wisdom other than co-operation with France. The Prime Minister touched the root when he said that he trusted France—knocking the bottom out of the current belief that we had removed one menace, Germany, only to set up another, France. But he is, one can but presume, too much in the grip of "financial" ideas not yet to have put away the shibboleth of the "economic interdependence" of European States; and while this is so, no compromise between the political ambitions of France and the business intentions of Britain seems possible.

The Future of the Entente.

Meanwhile, we are all waiting for something to turn up, and not in that state of sustained hope which M. Poincaré enjoys. If the passive resistance of the Ruhr were to fail, certainly the problem would be simplified (although it would not be solved); and we may take it that the possibility of some such happening was in the Premier's mind when he promised that Parliament would be specially assembled during the recess if something important took place. In the next few months, therefore, is held the future of the entente between Britain and France. Friendship between the two countries has survived longer than was thought possible by those who heeded the misrepresentations and displays of ignorance which have been shown on both sides of the Channel; but one is bound to fear that that friendship (indissoluble for private individuals) may not much longer find political expression. By the finer-minded in this country such withdrawal into a policy of isolation would be infinitely regretted; but "business" opposition to them is very strong. If, however, any attempt were made to substitute the friendship of any other European country for that of France, it would very certainly fail. The French, or nobody at all, must be our future allies.

Admiralty and Air Service.

The compromise which the Cabinet has made over the dispute between the Admiralty and the Air Ministry came as a surprise, the general opinion being that the Admiralty would win the day. That it has lost, however, is as yet by no means certain, for when the House reassembles there will be very hot discussion over the acceptance by the Cabinet of the main recommendations of the Committee of Imperial Defence. The Admiralty, towards whom the sentiments of most people are inclined, has many friends in the House; the Air Ministry, whose case is chiefly strong in theory, not so many.

But sentiment and theory count for little; practice is the one thing that matters. The temporary compromise consists in this. The Admiralty has lost its case for a separate arm in so far as the men of the R.A.F. who work with the fleet are not to change their uniform, and the Air Ministry retains the control of the supply department of naval aircraft and material. It has won in that it is to receive all the aircraft that it requires, and is to be allowed to include the cost of them in the Naval Estimates. And the personnel, material, and reserves of the naval air arm are not to be withdrawn by the Air Ministry without either the consent of the Admiralty or a decision of the Cabinet.

Nobody seems particularly happy about the compromise except the politicians and the journalists; but as they are the weightiest people in the world to-day, one supposes that some attempt to work this ingenious system of dual control will really be made.

August 4.

August 4 is variously regarded as the beginning of a great heroic event, of a sad, yet inspiring tragedy, and of an inevitable futility. In any case, the occasion is unforgettable. But since the War our feelings, it cannot be denied, and perhaps our consciences, have become dulled; and though we had for long been painfully aware of the fight which Earl Haig had been forced (by the fineness of his character) to make on behalf of ex-Service officers and men, it came with something of a shock to learn from him on this very date that there are still five thousand ex-officers seeking employment, a hundred thousand disabled men compelled to receive charity to make up the deficiency of their pension, and four hundred thousand ex-soldiers unable to get work. It is too late now to inquire into the cause of this sad state of affairs: the most and the best that the ordinary man can do is to respond to the Field-Marshal's appeal. Some charities, it is true, are run cynically and selfishly; but Earl Haig's Fund is the highest and most honourable kind of charity conceivable.

London Traffic.

At last the Government has realised that the traffic problem in London has become intolerable, and before the House adjourned on Thursday it was announced that a Bill is to be introduced next November proposing to make the Minister of Transport the central authority for London traffic, assisted by an advisory Board composed of representatives of local authorities and traffic users. That the Bill will meet with opposition is certain—for in the history of traffic private convenience has always opposed public interest; but the whole question has been so overlaid, not only with anomalies but now with dangers, that the prospect of the Bill's not becoming law is almost incredible. When it is realised that nearly all the statutory provisions for the control of traffic were made before the introduction of electric and motor traffic; when the absurd inconsistencies of the by-laws are brought home to one—no coal or beer, for instance, may be unloaded across the pavement between 10 a.m. and 6 p.m., but coke, wine, cider, and mineral waters may be so unloaded; and when we learn, from a recent statement by Scotland Yard, that the increase in the number of traffic fatalities is alarming—then it is surely time to grapple with and overcome the problem. Left to themselves, private interests will, generally speaking, increase both the number and speed of their vehicles; and our streets as they are simply will not stand such sport.

A Roman Fort.

For a long time in England history has been at war with tradition, particularly over matters relating to Roman times. During last century there was a constant effort to belittle our indebtedness to the Romans (with a consequent exaggeration of what the Teutons did in this country), but in this century tangible proof is being supplied of the extent and the permanency of the Romans' work here. The latest evidence is to be found in research, which began a day or two ago, at Filey, on the Yorkshire coast. Everyone who has been there knows of the tradition (until the present time disbelieved) of the submerged "bar" of rock about 20 ft. in width, and extending for about 200 yards, known as the "Roman Pier." Divers have been at work there, and it is almost satisfactorily proved already that the "pier" is of artificial construction. Probably it was a Roman coast-watch fort or signal station, for there is a chain of similar forts in the North: but, in any case, even if it be proved that it is not of Roman origin and was, say, built at the time of the Armada scare, it will justify the investigation of tradition which the nineteenth century in so superior a manner failed to make.

The "General Reader."

People often use the phrase "general reader" without in the least knowing what sort of man he is, or even what he reads. Now certain London libraries have recently published reports on the kind of books most frequently read, and it is perfectly astonishing to find such constancy and loyalty among what must be called an unintelligent class. We learn, for instance, that Sir Arthur Conan Doyle (though there is little wrong with the early Sir Arthur) and Mr. Donovan are "extraordinarily popular," that facile sprites like Mrs. Henry Wood, Miss Braddon, Miss Marie Corelli, and Mr. Silas and Mr. Joseph Hocking still maintain their unworthy positions. It is, however, good to know that Wilkie Collins is very appreciatively read (few would have guessed that); it is still better to know that allegiance to Ouida is declining; and it hardly comes as a shock or surprise to be informed that "Hardy has still to be appreciated"—you can scarcely in one lifetime dethrone Ouida and enthrone Hardy.

The other notable feature of these libraries' reports is the stress that they lay on the amount of politics and economics now being read. This is, or is not, according to one's personal taste, regrettable; but, in any case, it was inevitable since religion had passed out as the chief factor in men's lives. A feature in the reports that I am surprised to find is the absence of any mention of fantasy, which is at the moment, and is to be for the next few years, a most popular form of writing. The Hawthornden Prize for Literature, for example, was this year given to the writer of a fantasy. But as against this is the fact that romance, and particularly historical romance (such as some of Anthony's Hope's novels), is still holding its own.

ARMENIANS AND THE TREATY OF LAUSANNE.

The Joint Council of British Armenian Societies has addressed an appeal to Lord Curzon on behalf of the hundreds of thousands of Armenian refugees whose plight has been disregarded at the Lausanne Conference. The letter reads as follows:—

Your Lordship,

On behalf of British organisations interested in the welfare of the Armenians, we beg leave to express the hope that the signing of the treaty with Turkey may be the prelude to a new era of peace and prosperity for all the peoples of the Near East. The welcome decision of Turkey to apply for membership of the League of Nations gives some justification for this hope.

We cannot, however, forget that the Allied Powers, for well known reasons, promised the Armenian people their national freedom—promises which were welcomed by all civilised nations. These promises remain unfulfilled; but we respectfully maintain that the debt of honour thus contracted cannot be repudiated, and must be discharged in the only way the altered conditions allow.

In Greece and the islands, in Syria and Palestine, in Caucasian Armenia and elsewhere, there are scattered three-quarters of a million Armenian refugees, the only survivors of a once prosperous community of two million souls. The plight of these, and the fate of those others who lost life as well as home and property, indicate the heavy responsibility which rests upon the Allies. Such reparation as is humanly possible must be made to these suffering people. We suggest that His Majesty's Government should request the British representatives to the League of Nations to bring to the notice of the Assembly the unhappy condition of these victims of the Great War with a view to obtaining for them a solution by which they may be enabled to enjoy a reasonable measure of security and happiness.

We have the honour to be,

Conspiracy Trial Sentences.

The Conspiracy Trial sentences, promulgated on Thursday last, have proved to be very nearly what general opinion had anticipated. It was obvious that a conviction must entail the death penalty for five or six of the accused, who were shown by the evidence not only to have plotted to kill British subjects, but also to have personally carried out the murders, or at any rate many of them. The first accused, Ibrahim Khalil Nazir, was proved to have participated in eight murderous attempts, two of which he carried out single-handed, and to have been privy to several others. At the same time, there had been some surprise that only one of the accused had been acquitted, and that feeling of surprise has now been shown to have been justified by the fact that the Confirming Officer has quashed two of the sentences and remitted another. While there has been a complete absence of vindictiveness in the British community over this trial, there is now general satisfaction that the authors of some of the most atrocious crimes have been brought to book. At the same time there is general regret that the more highly placed instigators of the murder campaign, who have undoubtedly existed in the background, have not been identified and made to suffer the same penalty as their wretched agents. With the exception of two of the convicted men, all those who have just been tried are youths of no social standing, and, apart from the definite evidence of the existence of well-to-do supporters at their backs, it has all along been very clear that inducement to commit the crimes has been supplied by men of different type from the actual murderers.

Perhaps one of the most interesting circumstances of the trial has been the further light shed on the difficulty of obtaining witnesses in this country. Reluctance to give evidence for the prosecution was understandable, in view of the experience of such witnesses in previous important trials by Military Courts, but evidence for the defence also could be obtained only with the greatest difficulty. With the exception of two or three witnesses, all those who appeared to testify on behalf of the accused were obtained by defending counsel through the good offices of the police and the Public Security Department. This unwillingness to appear in a court of law arises partly from the general dislike on the part of inhabitants of this country to having anything whatever to do with the police or anybody connected with the law, but also from a more specific fear of the treatment accorded to a witness. One of the Arabic papers, in discussing the other day the necessary qualities in a candidate for Parliament, said that any would-be representative of a provincial constituency should have had the experience of being called to the markaz as a witness and being clapped into prison and treated as a convict while the case was being investigated. Then he would properly appreciate one of the abuses from which the fellaheen suffer.

Mysterious Disappearances.

Another interesting feature of the trial was its revelation of the way in which vital documents and articles connected with criminal cases in this country mysteriously disappear. Several important records could not be produced in court, while it was shown that the stomach washings from four men who alleged that they had been poisoned, and who were examined at Kasr el Aini Hospital, did not reach the analyst until eight weeks after they had been taken. The poison which it was thought had been used was hyoscine, all traces of which disappear in less than eight weeks.

There have been two other recent instances of the vanishing of important and possibly incriminating records. A man named McLeod died in suspicious circumstances in Upper Egypt, and a report was made to the Ministry of the Interior. There it lay for sixteen months. When the matter eventually came to the notice of the British Consul action was taken at once, but the analyst's report showed that even if death had been due to the cause suspected, too long a period had since elapsed for the fact to be established by chemical investigations.

The third case was not merely a disappearance, but a transformation. A box, apparently containing chocolates, sent by a well-known drug trafficker, was seized in transit through the post and its contents found to be chocolate-coated cocaine. But something happened before the seized package reached the analyst, with the result that he discovered only harmless chocolate creams. Such occurences as these exemplify the difficulties of the authorities in conducting criminal investigations of all kinds in this country.

Cocaine Traffic.

Apropos of cocaine, it may be remarked that the existing laws are proving utterly ineffectual to stamp out traffic in this drug. A penal code which provides only light fines for illicit traders has no terrors for smugglers and vendors, who pay the penalties imposed out of their huge profits, and carry on as before. So ludicrously ineffective are existing deterrents that the police have almost lost interest in the traffic, it being mere waste of time to arrest an offender, who will be fined a hundred piastres and set loose to resume his trade.

Hitherto it had been generally supposed that most of the cocaine and morphine which find their way into Egypt were smuggled in on vessels from Levant ports, working in conjunction with accomplices on shore. But the other day a big haul of the forbidden drug was made from a camel caravan which reached Port Said from the southern part of the Sinai Peninsula, indicating that the "dope" had been landed on the shores of the Red Sea. There is no doubt that the cocaine business is highly organised in this country. The consumption here is great, but there are always ample supplies available, and, owing to the immunity from police action which the retailers enjoy, it is possible for anybody who wants cocaine to get it without difficulty.

Not only cocaine dealers flourish in this tolerant country. The other day at Port Said a notorious hashish-den keeper was haled to court for the twentieth time and for the twentieth time paid the small fine imposed upon him. No doubt he has by now set himself up again in the business for the twenty-first time.

British Prestige.

Recent Consular Court proceedings in Alexandria have emphasised the fact—frequently commented upon by residents of long-standing—that there are just now in Egypt a good many British subjects whose modes of living are no credit to their nationality. In a country like Egypt, where there are so many nondescripts of various races and colours entitled to British protection, there are inevitably many of none too reputable character. But since the War a considerable number of British-born ex-soldiers and others have settled here, and many of them have been unable to obtain satisfactory employment of a permanent character. Some have gone so far off the rails as to get themselves deported. Last year five men were shipped off in a batch, and since then there have been other deportations. These were all men whose conduct brought them definitely within the range of the law, but there is a far larger number who, while perhaps doing nothing definitely illegal, are a standing discredit to their country of origin. Now that Egypt is evolving so rapidly politically it is more than ever necessary that the good reputation borne by Britons in this country shall be maintained. It is to be hoped, therefore, that it will be possible to induce men of the class to which I have referred either to change their ways or else to leave the country.

The Retirement of Borton Pasha.

Considerable regret in business circles, not unmixed with apprehension, is being aroused by the impending retirement of Borton Pasha, the P.M.G., which is now announced.

The Egyptian Post Office is no easy institution to manage, as correspondence in over fifteen different languages is handled daily, and each sender and addressee expects at least as good a service as obtains in his own country.

But it is on the financial side that the present régime has scored its principal successes. The introduction of the Collection Order Service, which has the entire confidence of merchants, who thereby deal "cash against documents" with their clients; of inland postal orders in varied colours for the benefit of illiterate fellaheen; and of the deposit account service, to obviate the necessity of business houses sending constantly to the Post Office over their transactions, which was recently introduced in the face of considerable opposition, and last year handled over £4,000,000, has in each case proved an immense boon. Moreover, it is remembered that in the upheaval of 1919 the postal staff alone remained at work and refused to join the strike of Government officials.

Lawlessness.

The outbreaks of sporadic lawlessness, which began with the attack on the High Commissioner's escort at Lake Huleh, have now ceased. Any attempt to attribute to them, collectively or individually, any political significance (as appears to have been done in certain sections of the English Press) is misplaced. As has now been amply made clear, the Lake Huleh episode had no bearing whatever on Palestinian persons, Palestinian politics, or even on Palestinian crime, but was "merely" an act of "self-defence" by hard-pressed Syrian Druze brigands, seeking rest and safety in Palestine. The murder of Captain Swann was the act of an outlaw and criminal, and the more recent attack near Tulkaram on the party of railway officials travelling from Haifa to Ludd, resulting in the death of Captain Wigely and two employees, was plainly just an attempt at robbery on a considerably larger and more desperate scale than the occasional holds-up of cars on isolated roads. Even elements of the local Arab Press, avid for grievances, called-for or uncalled-for, have ceased to argue that these episodes arise from a political motive, and account for them by the impoverished state of Palestinians, ground down by mis-rule and excessive taxation. Jews, on their side, have complained bitterly about the public insecurity in their National Home, and the ill-consequences it is having, or will have, in frightening away men and capital intent on the building up of their country. The speedy and effective means which the police took in running to earth the criminals concerned in the attacks on the members of the British Gendarmerie only made certain disgruntled Jews inclined to gibe at the Palestinian Police, to the effect that they were alert enough when they themselves were endangered, but were indifferent when it was the lives and property of the Jews which were at stake. I do not know on how good an authority the story was based, but a distinguished local Jew told how, on the occasion of Captain Swann's murder, the criminals first thought that their victim was a Jew, and asserted that they need not have too great fear as to the consequences, as the police hue and cry would not be too thorough; but when it was borne in upon them that this time it was an English officer whose death was in question, the matter took on quite another complexion; the band at once broke up and scattered.

Police Methods.

The police methods on this occasion soon proved fruitful of result; they levied a heavy daily fine on the district until the murderer should be discovered, with the result that the first fellah who became aware of the whereabouts of Abdul Kadir (the leader of the brigand gang) reported it to his village mukhtar—in spite of Abdul Kadir's promise that he himself would refund the amount of the fine the district would incur by keeping quiet about him! After Abdul Kadir had been shot by the police a memorandum was found in his possession giving details of his past victims and of the distribution of loot among his colleagues —together with a little list of intended victims.

Apparently no success has so far crowned the efforts of the police in tracking the band concerned in the attack on the railway officials. The gruesome detail of the headless body found afterwards means that the others feared identification through the recognition of one of their number. Even the extreme method of taking hostages of cattle from the neighbouring villages has so far had no effect in producing any culprits from the class of villagers. But the elaborate nature of the crime, and the necessary knowledge and preparation to derail that particular trolley containing that particularly large sum of money, hardly suggest that it was the act of fellaheen or even of the semi-professional brigand.

The Tel Aviv Squabble.

This last week saw a little labour squabble in Tel Aviv, the new Jewish suburb of Jaffa, which (to all appearances) has had too great importance attached to it in the telegrams sent to certain English newspapers; it certainly did not deserve the description "riot" which some have given it. A great deal of building had been going on during the last year or so in Tel Aviv; when the need for building grew less, as was the case during the past few months, a certain amount of unemployment naturally resulted. A certain organised group of Jewish workmen known as the "Poel Mizrachi" (the "Mizrachi" is an east-European Zionist organisation which gives a prominent place in its system to the observance of the orthodox Jewish religion) still had some outstanding contracts to complete. They were regarded with envious eyes by the unemployed of the larger, general workmen's trades union; and this latter group resented work being given to the minority (or representatives of a minority) in preference to representatives of the unemployed belonging to the larger union. Their grievance seems hardly such as to arouse sympathy, but they seemed to think that the ethics of employment had been violated, and forcibly interrupted a group of the "Poel Mizrachi" engaged on one of their contracts. The British Gendarmerie and Arab police were called in to restore order; and that seems to have been the worst crime of all—that "foreign police" should be appealed to, to intervene in Jewish internal disputes, and that in the most exclusive and treasured Jewish centre of the whole National Home. The police intervention was vigorous—too vigorous for the tastes of the Jewish Labour Party, who are now passing resolutions and publishing manifestoes charging the police with attacking a peaceful crowd of innocent civilians without warning, and "making the streets of Tel Aviv run with blood." More than twenty of the workmen concerned were arrested and sentenced to a week's imprisonment (by a non-Jewish magistrate!); but they have since been released on bail pending an appeal.

The episode, as we said before, is quite unimportant; it is only interesting as local colour.

The Patriarchate.

French publicity is being given to the long-standing dispute within the Jerusalem Patriarchate of the Eastern Orthodox Church. Historically, the Jerusalem Patriarchate is, and has been for many centuries, virtually nothing more than a convent of monks (who elected from their own number Patriarch, titular Metropolitans and Archimandrites) entrusted with the guardianship and maintenance of the Holy Places in Jerusalem and elsewhere in Palestine, supported financially by the Christians of Greece, and drawing for its personnel also from the same source; from another point of view, however, the Patriarchate may be looked upon as a Greek-speaking hierarchy, administering a fairly large geographical area, and acting as spiritual head of some fifty thousand Arab-speaking Orthodox Christian laity This Greek hierarchy (properly known as "The Fraternity of the Holy Sepulchre") has, during past years, run heavily into debt from various causes, and its pastoral works—schools, hospitals, charity and the like—have consequently suffered. Very extensive pieces of Orthodox Church landed property have had to be sold—almost in every case to various Jewish societies (this is a standing Arab grievance; but these properties had to be sold, and there were no other large buyers): and the financial affairs have been placed in the hands of a committee appointed as a result of the Government Commission on Patriarchal Affairs which sat in 1921.

The Arab-speaking Orthodox laity feel that they have a large number of legitimate grievances, and this past week they have been holding a Conference

They passed resolutions under some forty heads, mainly directed towards introducing lay (and therefore Arab) influence and control in Patriarchal affairs and securing a greater efficiency in the financial administration of the Patriarchate, and more advantages in the way of educational facilities for the children of the laity.

ROUMANIA.

Bucharest, July 23.

The Mission of M. Bratianu.

M. Vintila Bratianu has returned to Bucharest, and the Press generally has commented with impatience upon his reticence and the delay in making any public statement as to the success of his mission, taking his silence as spelling failure and taunting him with the unpopularity, real or supposed, which his party's policy has gained for this country abroad. This unpopularity, in so far as it may exist, cannot perhaps all be laid at the door of the Liberal Party, as British and other exporting firms can doubtless explain, but certainly the series of laws passed during last session have not tended to increase the confidence of foreign capitalists in this country or to encourage foreign enterprises or even foreign trade. It was apparently very generally believed that M. Bratianu had gone abroad with the idea of trying to raise a loan against concessions either of the State forest or petroleum lands, but he has now expressly denied that he had any such purpose, although, as stated last month, the Indépendance Roumaine, the semi-official organ of the Liberal Party, stated on his departure that one of the objects of his journey was "to find, in the form of a loan, the capital required by the State to collaborate with private Roumanian industry in the development of the timber industry, etc." M. Bratianu expresses himself as satisfied with the results of his journey, and says that he has succeeded in convincing the politicians and others in France and England with whom he came in contact of the rightness of Roumania's national policy, as represented chiefly by his Government.

Recent Government Measures.

However that may be, not everyone concerned is satisfied with some of the recent Government measures. The French and Czech Press characterise as an "act of brigandage" the moratorium granted to Roumanian debtors by the law passed last month, and warn the Minister of Finance that French and Czech creditors "do not intend to submit without a struggle to the confiscation of their fortunes." According to the Press of last week some modification of the law may be expected, to the effect that only those creditors may seek its protection who are really not in a position to pay their debts in high valuta. This, however, will probably prove rather a difficult point to settle.

The Temps also comments very severely on the recent law regarding the liquidation of ex-enemy property, stating that in its effect upon Transylvanian properties it is contrary to the provisions of the Treaty of Peace. The Hungarians, who will be the chief sufferers under the law, are doubtless hoping to be able to press this argument.

The anti-speculation law, previously mentioned, has caused great discontent among the shopkeepers in this country, one of its most obnoxious provisions being that which requires that prices be affixed to all goods, the penalty for non-compliance being very severe indeed. The law has apparently been rigorously enforced in Constantza, where fourteen merchants have been summoned under this article. A protest meeting was held last week, and a memorandum was read, which it was intended to present to the Minister of Industry and Commerce during his visit to that town. The memorandum protested notably against the methods of administration of the law and demanded greater clearness in the drafting of the articles. The delegation which presented the memorandum was accompanied by 500 of the local shopkeepers, and on the following day during the hours of the trial of the fourteen "victims" all the Constantza shops were closed in protest.

The death took place last week of M. Theodore Rosetti, at the age of 86, one of the last contemporaries of Cuza Voda, the great Roumanian patriot of the middle of last century.

Peace Celebrations.

During the past week the Government offices were closed every day except Saturday, and "grandiose manifestations" took place. On Wednesday there were official receptions by H.M. the Khalif, by Adnan Bey, by Selaheddin Adil Bey, the Military Governor, and, in addition, special memorial services were held in all mosques in memory of the fallen. These services were attended by all the corporations and guilds, who formed large processions through the principal streets. Vehicular traffic was suspended from 11 a.m. to 3 p.m., in order to give the employees of the tramway company the opportunity of participating in the celebrations. The whole proceedings, although not very impressive, were orderly, and great credit is due to the city police for the admirable way in which they marshalled the manifestants.

The Assembly.

The next move in the complicated process of making peace is the ratification by the Grand National Assembly of the engagements assumed by their plenipotentiary at Lausanne. The latest reports concerning the meeting of the new Assembly indicate that it is unlikely to assemble before August 12. August 2 had been freely hinted as the fateful date; but there are still about sixty Deputies unelected, and, although news from the Eastern vilayets is scanty, it is certain that great difficulties are being experienced by the Government Party in its efforts to make these constituencies swallow its nominees. However, the Government Press is laying stress upon the necessity of convoking the Assembly at the earliest possible moment in order that the preliminary business may be transacted, and the question of the ratification of the Treaty settled. There appears to be no doubt that Ismet's Treaty will be formally approved.

Digitized by Google

Various prominent members of the Government are either en villégiature or touring the country. Mustapha Kemal Pasha is resting in Smyrna, and is expected to go for a few days to the local watering-place, Tcheshme. Hussein Reouf is just off to see his constituents at Sivas. Ismet Pasha is still bargaining with the Americans at Lausanne, and is not expected back here for about a week. Hence it is probable that the Press prognostications concerning the date of the convocation of the Assembly have some foundation in fact.

Press on the Peace.

The comments on the peace by the various organs of the Constantinople Press have on the whole been fairly reasonable. Now and again there has been a suspicion of the feeling which the old countryman attributed to his dog in Dr. John Brown's story: "Life's full of sairiousness for him, puir beastie; he can just never get eneugh of fechtin'." The overwhelming majority of Turks, however, has had "eneugh of fechtin'," and they are realising that peace has its problems which have to be tackled. The most serious paper in Constantinople, the Tanin, has given the lead by approaching the question of the collective responsibility of the Council of Commissaries. As Hussein Djahid Bey rightly points out, the first National Assembly was an abnormal phenomenon, and the theory that the Commissaries (or ministers) are merely the porte parole of the Assembly without any collective responsibility and without individual initiative, is exploded, for, as a matter of fact, they have taken measures upon their own responsibility, otherwise nothing would have been accomplished either in internal or external affairs. He goes on to point out that one of the first and fundamental tasks of the new Assembly will be to modify the mode of election of the Commissaries, obviously with the object of bringing the system of government more nearly into line with that which obtains in the majority of European countries.

Internal Problem.

Meanwhile, there is urgent need of practical statesmanlike resolution of a mass of internal problems, of which the principal are finance and the minorities. These two are much more closely allied than it appears on the surface. The State finances are in such a chaotic condition that the State officials in Constantinople were not paid before the feast of Kourban Bairam. Even the bankrupt Constantinople Government used by hook or by crook to raise enough money to do that. The rate of sterling exchange is steadily rising; the expected appreciation of Turkish currency for sentimental reasons on the signature of peace was hardly perceptible, and now the principal influences at work are the enforced covering of bear operations, the imminence of Allied evacuation, which will enormously reduce the amount of sterling available on the market, and general pessimism concerning the country's prospects.

The connection between the financial question and that of the minorities is very close, for it cannot be denied that it is the non-Moslem population, not only in Constantinople, but in Anatolia, which has shown commercial and financial enterprise and skill, and under present conditions it is obvious that their most prudent course is to restrict their operations and export their capital from Turkey. Matters have reached a critical stage in the fig industry, which used to be a gold mine for part of the Aidin vilayet and the port of Smyrna. At a recent conference at Kara Pinar it was stated that owing to present conditions the cultivator cannot afford to pay the railway and packing charges, and cannot raise the money to do so. Thus the crops are rotting on the trees, and the loss to the country is estimated at five and a-half million Turkish pounds, which would have helped to support the Turkish exchange. This is but one example of many which might be cited.

THE DURAND LINE.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—In opening the discussion on Sir Hamilton Grant's lecture to the East India Association on July 16, I said that Sir Mortimer Durand had asked for trouble in 1894 when he proposed the creation of a "No Man's Land" on the North-Western Frontier; and I suggested its division between India and Afghanistan. The lecturer attributed the perennial unrest that prevails there to the tendency of population to outstrip the supply of food. . . . "If the Indo-Afghan frontiers were conterminous we should be able to increase the cultivable area of the territory assigned to us by creating systems of irrigation; to suppress blood-feuds and give this much-vexed region the blessings of peace. Emulation is the mainspring of progress; it is quite possible that the good example set by Great Britain might be followed across the border."

Sir Edmund Barrow, in his concluding remarks, said that the Scottish Highlands were pacified after '45 by piercing them with military roads. But the roads to which the distinguished chairman alluded were constructed by Field-Marshal Wade twenty years before that rising; and proved most useful to the military operations for suppressing it. The methods adopted by George the Second's Ministers for destroying the tribal organisation were unjust, cruel, but terribly effective. They gave each Highland chief a fee-simple of the territory which had been from time immemorial a collective possession of his clan. The new landowners forthwith cleared their estates of crofters and turned the former into sheep farms. Readers of Dr. Samuel Johnson's "Journey to the Hebrides" may remember the reflections suggested by the spectacle of shipping on the west coast of Scotland waiting to convey cargoes of dispossessed Highlanders to Canada.—I am, etc.,

THE RELIGIONS OF THE NEAR AND MIDDLE EAST.

"SEMITIC RELIGIONS: HEBREW, JEWISH, CHRISTIAN, MOSLEM." By David M. Kay, D.D. Regius Professor of Divinity and Oriental Languages at the University of St. Andrews. (Edinburgh.: T. and T. Clark. 7s. 6d. net.)

The world's organised religions have been a factor of prime importance in the development of civilisation; and it is meet that they should be exhaustively studied. Sir James Frazer and his school have traced each phase in their evolution from animism, magic, the worship of nature-powers and ancestors, polytheism, and monotheism. Less attention has been given to the later history of religion and to its social influence; nor is the cause far to seek. The Law of Struggle applies with full force to theology, and, until recent years, the champions of rival creeds were unable to discern a grain of truth in any save their own. Orthodoxy, said Bishop Warburton, is my doxy, heterodoxy is other people's doxy. Hence the bigotry which nullified early mission effort; the abuse which was hurled at the Hindu Pantheon and at the Founder of Mohammedanism.

Scientific and archæological discoveries have widened the Christian's outlook and wrought a marvellous change in his attitude towards alien creeds. Sympathy is bred by deeper knowledge; most students realise that the religious instinct in the myriad manifestations should be treated with reverence; that all the world's organised religions are inter-related, and that no race has a monopoly of Divine truth. The new departure is illustrated by Professor Kay's sketch of the Semitic religions, which reproduces a series of lectures delivered by him in St. Giles's Cathedral during the early months of 1922. He traces their history objectively and without undue bias. Although he is evidently a sincere Christian, he is no slave to bibliolatry; and holds with St. Paul that "the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life."

For readers of THE NEAR EAST Professor Kay's treatment of Islam possesses absorbing interest. Its success in persuading its adherents to abstain from the use of wine was, indeed, a notable achievement, for:—

> A majority in any community may impose certain kinds of abstinence; but that is not temperance, because it is not governance of self by what is peculiar to self. Reason is often insufficient to restrain the appetites from satisfying themselves, although reason clearly foresees the disastrous effects of indulgence. By appealing in the name of Allah to the voluntary choice of his adherents, Mohammed succeeded where many zealous agencies have failed. . . .
> Judged by its fruits, Islam can claim a power over its adherents and a pervasive influence on their lives which contemporary systems attain only among their most zealous groups.

Again:—

> British Christians owe to themselves and to Islam the duty of understanding the rise and progress of this religion. Our circle of knowledge welcomes information about ancient Crete and Egypt, about primitive customs in New Guinea and Tibet. There is a richer intellectual stimulus in appreciating the spiritual forces that emerged from Arabia, captured and held the devotion of so many diverse races, and are still throbbing with vitality.

But Professor Kay overshoots the mark when he asserts that Islam was not propagated by the sword. It is true that within a century of the Founder's death it had conquered half the known world and ruled from Samarkand to Gibraltar; that, unlike Alexander's ephemeral empire, those of the Khalifs enjoyed a splendid civilisation for five hundred years; and that the power of Islam to win converts has long survived the destruction of its aggressive forces. Professor Kay, however, ignores the bigotry of the fierce Seljuk Turks, who allowed no dissidents in conquered territory; he forgets the fact that the Abbaside and Fatimid Khalifs were quite as intolerant as Philip II. and Louis XIV. History belies his assertion that the seventy million Indian Moslems "were won by an appeal to their heart and mind." Every wave of Mohammedan invasion which swept over India between the eleventh and the fifteenth centuries was followed by forcible conversions. The Puritan Emperor Aurungzib held no pact with idolaters, and the great bulk of the Mohammedan population of Bengal descend from Hindus whom his Satraps forced to abandon the religion of their forbears. "It was by the alienation of native races," wrote Sir William Hunter, "that the Mughal empire perished; it is by the incorporation of those races into a loyal and united people that British rule will endure."

IRRIGATION IN INDIA.

'IRRIGATION IN INDIA.' (India of To-day Series.) By D. G. Harris (London: H. Milford. 3s. net.)

This little book of 100 pages deals admirably with its subject, and our only complaint is that the subject is not accurately indicated by the title. The writer has confined his attention to the irrigation-canals managed by the Governments of British India. He thus excludes the great bulk of the irrigation in Indian States, and the vast amount of irrigation done in British India from private works, while he does not say a word about the agricultural aspects of irrigation, aspects which are not less important than those with which he deals. The title is thus about three times too big; but anyone who wants a concise and non-technical sketch of the development of the State irrigation-works in British India will find the book entirely satisfactory. The only doubtful statement we have noticed is to the effect that the old Hissar Canal was remodelled by Ali Mardan Khan in 1626; Ali Mardan Khan did not enter Shahjahan's service until 1637, and according to the chroniclers the work in question was sanctioned ten years later.

THE SINAIA CONFERENCE.

The recent conference at Sinaia between representatives of Czecho-Slovakia, Roumania, and Yugoslavia will prove, it is to be hoped, a definite landmark in the rehabilitation of South-Eastern Europe. Although no striking decisions were taken, the general trend of the meeting, as far as can be judged from the published reports, was towards the adoption of a more conciliatory attitude on the part of the Little Entente in foreign affairs. Thus in regard to Hungary it was agreed that no obstacle should be placed in the way of her financial reconstruction. No doubt this somewhat negative concession will be hedged around with restrictions; but it marks an advance on the former attitude of the three powers concerned towards Hungary. On the subject of Bulgaria the Conference seems to have avoided anything in the nature of a concrete resolution. The attempt, however, to commit the Little Entente in effect to an active anti-Bulgarian policy, if such an attempt were made, must have failed, and the sense of the meeting would seem to have been in favour of a more friendly attitude towards the new régime in Bulgaria. If the spirit of the conference has been accurately reflected, it is a gain to the cause of peace to have a policy of instinctive hostility replaced, if only by a readiness to judge future developments on their merits. The former argues a complete absence of statesmanship, and closed the door to any prospect of a better era in Balkan history; the latter frame of mind leaves the way open to a gradual improvement in international relationships. Conditions in Western Europe have their counterpart in many respects in the Little Entente, but with the important difference that there is no equivalent in South-Eastern Europe to the potential danger that Germany must always be to France. Yugoslavia can point out that she is more directly affected by the menace of a Bulgarian revanche than are Czecho-Slovakia and Roumania; but she would not appear to have been able to convince either of her partners at Sinaia that there was any justification for the least anxiety on this score. No one urges that the Yugoslav Government should expose its country to the slightest risk; it is asked merely to examine in the light of common sense what it is inclined to regard as a danger, in view of the fact that the alleged danger is seen by everyone else to be non-existent. The possibility of an understanding with Bulgaria under the Stambolisky régime having been recognised in Belgrade, Yugoslavia's partners seem to have persuaded her at Sinaia not to rule such a possibility out of court now, simply because there is a new Bulgarian Government, but to give the Bulgarians time to show whether the same basis for an understanding still exists, and, if not, whether they can offer a satisfactory one in its place.

At best the Sinaia results were of a negative order, and for practical purposes they must be followed by a more definite policy in one quarter or another. The inevitable tendency will be to await the results of the Ruhr crisis owing to the fact that no one can foresee what direction developments in the West are likely to take. This delay, we are convinced, would be a mistake, as it might help towards a clarification of the Western situation, if it were realised that in no circumstances can complications in Central or South-Eastern Europe be relied upon to exert even an indirect influence on the affairs of the Greater Entente. Although the Sinaia Conference broke up without coming to any decision in regard to Bulgaria's claim for an outlet on the Ægean, there is no reason why the three Governments should not take the lead in an endeavour to arrive at a settlement on a question that materially concerns interests of the whole of South-Eastern Europe. The collaboration of Greece, it has been announced by the Foreign Minister of Yugoslavia, was desired by the Conference, but not as a member of the Little Entente, in case the latter should be committed to an enlarged programme. Whether Greece will be content with a place "below the salt" at Conferences of the Little Entente remains to be seen; but practically all danger of an enlarged programme would be removed if Greece were helped to put her foreign relations on a satisfactory basis. In other words, now that peace between Greece and Turkey has been established without fear of any rupture for some years to come at least, there remain only the relations between Greece and Bulgaria as a possible complication, even if any issue between them could be regarded as constituting an enlarged programme for the Little Entente.

It is evident from the letter that Mr. Ronald McNeill, Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, writes to The Times in amplification of his speech in the House of Commons just before the adjournment, that the Allies cannot be counted upon to reopen the question of an Ægean outlet for Bulgaria. Mr. McNeill, expressing, presumably, the views of the British Government, holds that Bulgaria has no right to claim a territorial corridor connecting her with the sea, and pointed out that, when the Bulgarian delegation at Lausanne indicated that it would accept nothing less, the Allies withdrew their offer of a harbour under Bulgarian administration, with a railway under international control, and "declined to put pressure on the Greeks to make further concessions to Bulgaria's unreasonable demands." In matters of this nature, as the Allied Governments are well aware, there is no hard-and-fast standard of what is right and what is wrong in regard to claims, or what demands are reasonable and what unreasonable. The Treaty of Neuilly belongs to a series of documents all of which have been proved to be grossly unjust in many of their provisions. In one particular—the amount of reparations—the Treaty has been amended because its terms were found on impartial examination to be outrageous. Is it so very wrong for the Bulgarians to suggest, and even to maintain with some persistence, that the clauses in the Treaty of Neuilly which debar them from a territorial corridor to the Ægean are equally outrageous? To charge Bulgaria with perversity in the light of Turkey's attitude towards the Treaty of Sèvres is merely childish. What is needed is an impartial examination of the Supreme Council's territorial settlement in the Balkans, in the light of practical politics, with a view to achieving permanent peace and in a spirit free from vindictiveness. No one is better qualified to take the lead in this delicate task than Dr. Benesh, of Czecho-Slovakia, who must realise that until the question is settled satisfactorily, there can be no real peace in the Balkans, and that the machinery of economic reconstruction will remain clogged.

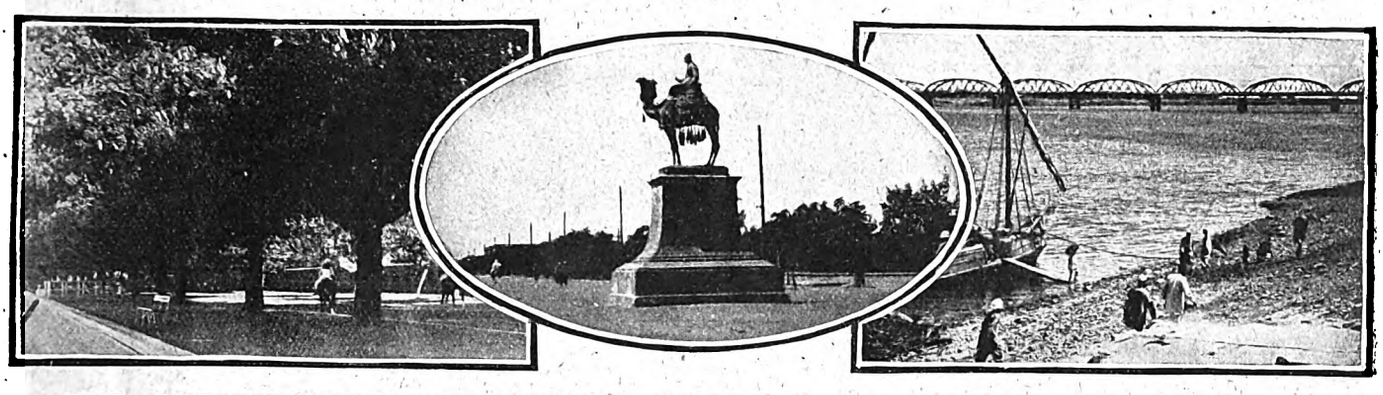
THE SUDAN—VI.



THE PRESERVATION OF AFRICAN BIG GAME.

Almost every territory in Africa under European administration has some form of protection for the fauna of the country. Until quite lately, however, there were large areas of the continent outside the reach of government, and as a result of the introduction of modern rifles the game in these parts has been in imminent peril of extermination. The problem of preservation is more difficult in some countries than in others, owing to the advance of civilisation and the influx of settlers. In places where it is possible for the white man to settle and to farm, the game will, sooner or later, have to give way; but there will still be large areas where the white man cannot live, which are a natural sanctuary for the game. It is owing to the shortsighted policy of certain Governments in allowing natives to acquire rifles and ammunition that in vast territories inhabited only by the natives the game is gradually being exterminated, as without a large staff of game rangers it is almost impossible to enforce any legislation.

Disappearing Fauna.

Within the memory of man four animals have become, to all intents and purposes, extinct—the quagga, the bontebok, the bleshok, and the white-tailed gnu—only a very few remaining, strictly preserved on one or two South African farms.

The white rhinoceros, which only a few years ago was common south of the Zambesi, is now restricted there to less than twenty living specimens. In 1836 Sir Andrew Smith, while travelling in the country north of the Magaliesberg, saw between a hundred and a hundred and fifty during a day's march; Captain F. C. Selous mentions that the white rhinoceros, which was by no means uncommon between 1873 and 1877, had in 1879 completely disappeared from the Upper Chobe Rivers. This animal, the second largest pachyderm in the world, still exists in fair numbers in the Sudan, where it is strictly preserved. Unlike its cousin, the black rhinoceros, it is a harmless, inoffensive creature that lives almost entirely on grass. It is blind and stupid, and is easily killed when once its spoor has been located. Its horn is much valued, especially in the East, where it is either turned into cups which are supposed to detect the presence of poison, or ground into a powder for the manufacture of a potent medicine.

The Elephant.

Although more plentiful than the rhinoceros, the elephant is in almost as great danger of extermination, if the present rate of destruction is allowed to continue. As long as there is a demand for ivory, so long will men use the elephant as a means of increasing their wealth. It is, however, a case of killing the goose that lays the golden eggs. Whereas only a few years ago tusks of over 100 lb. in weight were not an uncommon sight in the markets of such places as Omdurman, to-day if such a tusk be brought in, it is a topic of conversation for days. The old elephants carrying tusks of 100 lb. or more have gone; those with ivory of 80, 70, or 60 lb. are rapidly going; it will then be the turn of the young and virile bulls, and lastly the cows and the remnants of the herds.

In all territories under British authority every effort is being made to prevent this catastrophe, and a limit of 30 lb. weight for each tusk has been imposed on warrantable ivory. This limit will include automatically, with very few exceptions, all female elephants, inasmuch as cows are very rarely found carrying ivory of more than 25 lb. weight. So long as other nations, however, allow elephants to be killed with ivory of lesser weight, tusks will be taken across the frontiers and brought back as ivory obtained outside the country where the restrictions are in force.

Before the outbreak of the War efforts were being made by the Society for the Preservation of the Fauna of the Empire to induce all nations concerned to establish an international weight for ivory applicable to all territories in Africa under European administration. If this could be done, all ivory under the stipulated weight would at once be confiscated by the Customs officials, and it would soon be realised that the destruction of female elephants and immature bulls was no longer profitable. At the same time it would be necessary to put a tax on all articles manufactured from ivory, most of which consists of female tusks, to prevent the tusks from being cut up before arrival at the Customs stations. As already stated, there are still large tracts of almost inaccessible country where the elephant and other game can find a natural sanctuary. This, however, is not sufficient, as elephants, in particular, travel huge distances and would soon be outside the limits of the preserve. Unlike most of the gazelles and antelopes the elephant is a slow-breeding animal; under normal conditions a cow might produce five calves in a lifetime.

In this connection, with this subject of game protection, reference may here be made to the Ordinance promulgated this year by the Sudan Government for the preservation of wild animals, a summary of which was published in The Near East of March 22. In addition to a number of regulations regarding the game that may or may not be killed, two areas, comprising 3,000 square miles each, have been defined as sanctuaries for all or certain kinds of animals. In these no one may hunt or kill. The district south of the Rejaf-Aba (Belgian Congo) road and west of the Bahr El Jebel is a reserve for all kinds of game, as is also the triangle in the Upper Nile Province formed by the Bahr El Zeraf, the Bahr El Jebel, and the White Nile. In the Sudan, fortunately, the officials are the very best type of sportsmen. Without their co-operation and assistance it would be quite impossible to enforce any regulations for the protection of the game.

According to the Monthly Journal of the Sudan Chamber of Commerce, the arrivals of gum arabic during May were 26,052 kantars, all sold at El-Obeid market. This amount of arrivals at El-Obeid compared with the same period of the previous year is quite unusual. Arrivals at all other stations were also very abundant. Demands from abroad were much less than previous months, and consequently prices were all round lower; the average price at El-Obeid during May was £E1.370 mms.

AN EARLY TRAVELLER IN THE SUDAN AND ABYSSINIA.

By "ABU NAKHLA."

The first instalment of this article was contained in "The Near East" of June 7. M. Poncet, whose travels are described in his book "A Voyage to Æthiopia. Made in the years 1698, 1699, and 1700," is just entering Abyssinia from the Sudan.—Ed.

These were long before the days when Menelik had made Shoa in the south supreme in the hegemony of States which comprise the Ethiopian Empire, and the capital lay in the north-west at Gondar, which is now no more than the capital of the Province of Gojjam. Yasu—whose name Poncet writes as Jesus—claimed the title of King of Kings, Negus Negusti, and evidently kept considerable state.

When I was recover'd of the Fatigues of so long and painful a Voyage, he (the King) did me the Honour to give me a publick Audience. It was on the tenth of August, about ten a Clock in the Morning. They waited on me at my Chamber, and after having conducted me thro' more than Twenty Apartments, I enter'd into a Hall, where the Emperour was seated upon his Throne. It was a Sort of Couch cover'd with a Carpet of red Damask flower'd with Gold; There were round about great Cushions wrought with Gold. This Throne of which the Feet were of Massy Silver, was plac'd at the Bottom of a Hall in an Alcove cover'd with a Dome all shining with Gold and Azure. The Emperour was cloath'd with a Vest of Silk, embroider'd with Gold, and with very long Sleeves. The Scarf with which he was girt was embroider'd after the same Manner, He was bare-headed, and his Hair braided very neatly. A great Emerald glitter'd on his Forehead, and added Majesty to him. He was alone in the Alcove I mention'd, seated upon his Couch with his legs across after the Manner of the Orientals. The great Lords were on each Side of him standing in their Ranks, having their Hands cross'd one upon the other, and observing an awful Silence.

Poncet then presented his credentials and the gifts to the Negus of which he was the bearer, and afterwards had the honour of dining with the King. It was customary that the King should attend in state at the Ceremony of the Feast of the Assumption, and this he failed not to do, in spite of the admitted inconveniences caused by the course of Poncet's physic on which he had now embarked. Poncet received an invitation to the ceremony, and—fail'd not to be at it about eight a Clock, and found about twelve thousand Men drawn up in Rank and File in the great Court of the Palace. The Emperour was upon that Occasion clad with a Vest of blue Velvet flower'd with Gold which trail'd upon the Ground, his Head was cover'd with a Muslin strip'd with Gold, which fram'd a sort of Crown after the Manner of the Ancients, and which left the Middle of his Head bare; his Shoes were wrought after the Indian Fashion with Flowers beset with Pearls. Two Princes of the Blood richly cloathed, waited for him at the Palace Gate with a magnificent Canopy, under which the Emperour march'd with his Trumpets, Kettle-Drums, Flutes, Hautboys, and other Instruments going before him, which made a good agreeable Harmony. He was follow'd by the seven chief Ministers of the Empire, supporting each other under the Arms, and with their Heads cover'd almost like the Emperour, having each a lance in his Hand. He that walk'd in the Middle carry'd the Imperial Crown with his Head uncover'd, and seem'd to rest it with some Difficulty against his Breast. This Crown which is clos'd with a Cross of precious Stones on the Top is very magnificent. I march'd in the same Line with the Ministers habited after the Turkish Manner, and conducted by an Officer who held me under the Arm. The Officers of the Crown supported in the same Manner, followed singing the Praises of the Emperour, and answering as it were in Choires. Then came the Musketeers in their close-body'd Coats of different Colours, and were follow'd by the Archers carrying their Bows and Arrows. Last of all, this Procession was clos'd by the Emperour's led Horses richly harness'd, and cover'd with costly Stuffs of Gold hanging down to the Ground, over which were the Skins of Tygers extremely beautiful.

The Emperor was conducted to his place in the church by the Patriarch in full canonicals between lanes of priests clad in white. After the Emperor had received the Communion in both kinds the ceremony ended with the firing of two cannon. If we may trust Poncet's description, or even if we make considerable deductions from it, the Gondar of those times was a very considerable place :—

The Palace is great, and spacious, and the Situation very fine. It is in the Middle of the Town upon a rising which overlooks the Country round about; 'tis almost a League in compass; the Walls are of Free-stone flank'd with Towers, upon which are raised great Crosses of Stone. . . . Altho' the Extent of the Town be of three or four Leagues, yet it has not the Beauty of ours, nor can it have, because the Houses are only of one Story, and have no Shops.

All trade was carried on in the market-place, and the medium of exchange was gold bars, from which pieces were cut as required. Many assayers were available to test the gold and prevent fraud by the use of impure metal. Then, as now, salt was used for small change, but Poncet makes no mention of the Maria Theresa dollar, and cartridges had not, of course, yet made their appearance as currency.

We need not follow Poncet into his theological discussions with the Emperor and Patriarch, Abona Marcos. Abyssinia was, and still is, priest-ridden; in Gondar alone there were over one hundred churches, and the predecessor of Abona Marcos had at one sitting ordained ten thousand priests and six thousand deacons. On the other hand, we read that—

The Emperour Ati Basili, Grandfather to this Prince, who at this Time reigns so gloriously, caus'd Seven Thousand of them to be thrown head-long from the Top of the Mountain Balbau, for having revolted against him.

It seems possible that ordinations, though carried out on the grand scale, did little more than replace casualties. Poncet's account of the rise and fall of the Portuguese influence in Abyssinia is of interest :—

The Horror which the Æthiopians have for the Mahometans and Europeans is almost equal. The Occasion was this. The Mahometans having render'd themselves Powerful in Æthiopia in the beginning of the 16th Age, made themselves Masters of the Government. The Abyssins not being able to support so hard and so odious a Yoak as that of the Mohametans, call'd in the Portuguese to their Assistance, who at that time were famous in the Indies, where they had newly Establish'd themselves. These new Conquerors were overjoy'd to find a free Entrance into Æthiopia. They marched against the Mahometans encountered them, defeated them entirely, and resettled the Imperial Family upon the Throne. So important a Service render'd the Portuguese considerable at the Court of Æthiopia. Many of them planted themselves there and enjoy'd the principal Employs. Their Numbers increas'd, Corruption of Manners crept in, and they gave themselves such Liberties, that they rais'd a Jealousie in the Æthiopians, that they design'd to make themselves Masters of their Country and subject it to the Crown of Portugal. Upon this Suspicion, the People were in a Fury against the Portuguese; they took up Arms in all Places, and made a terrible Slaughter of them, at the Time they thought themselves most securely established in that Empire. Those who escaped from this first Commotion, had a Liberty allow'd to retire. There departed out of Æthiopia seven thousand Portuguese Families, who dispersed themselves thro' the Indies, and upon the Coasts of Africk. Some few remained in the Country, and from these Families do the white Abyssins descend who are amongst them, and from whence they pretend the present Empress, whom I mention'd before, draws her Origin.

(To be concluded.)

SUDAN COTTON PROGRESS.

The following particulars are given in the report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government for May :—

Kassala Province.

April.—The total cotton brought in to the market up to the end of April exceeded 6,355 kantars of 315 rotls, and the amount ginned was 4,895 kantars. Cotton still continues to come in very fast, and daily arrivals average about 200 kantars. There seems to be no doubt that the original estimate of 9,500 kantars will be exceeded. From April 1 the working hours in the ginnery have been increased to 10, and 140 kantars are ginned per diem. It is hoped later to increase the hours to 16 per diem; by this means possibly between 4,000-5,000 kantars will be ginned per month. The work on the lesser cuttings 10 and 11 of the main canal is proceeding slowly, but should be finished by the end of May. The delay is partly due to the demand for labour for the new Hadaliya and Mekali cuts. The seed farm should give an average of 3 to 3½ kantars per feddan. The experimental farm at Rabakassa has only produced about 1 kantar per feddan to date excepting American, which has produced 5 kantars per feddan.

May.—The total cotton brought in to the end of May is approximately 11,100 kantars. The quality of the cotton has shown a distinct falling off since May 10. The lower grades are increasing, and there is a marked falling away of first-class. The market will close finally on June 15, but for cotton brought in from June 5-15 the price will be reduced to P.T. 346 per kantar of 315 rotls. The last Wad Sharifai market will be held about the end of May. The results from this area are interesting. So far the first-class cotton has given 1,165 kantars out of a total of 1,365 kantars. The average yield will work out finally at 3 to 3½ kantars. The bulk of the cotton still to come in is from the late sown areas immediately north of Kassala and at the tail of the Delta. Tokar cotton ginned in May amounted to about 3,150 kantars. The experimental farm at Wad Sharifai was closed on May 9, the total yield from 10 feddans being 50 kantars. The highest yield was 5.5 kantars per feddan of Sakel from the unploughed part, whereas in 1922 the ploughed areas gave a heavier yield. This farm is now being ploughed in preparation for next season's crops. The Hadalya Farm is disappointing in comparison with the Wad Sharifai and Rabakassa; but it is hoped to obtain an average yield before the end of the season. At Rabakassa, the yield to date is 61 kantars from 19 feddans of cotton, and here American cotton has given a yield of 6.8 kantars per feddan to the end of May. Picking at Rabakassa is in full swing.

Blue Nile Province.

April.—Barakat and Tayiba cotton results are much the same as last year, but Hosh has only given about 3 kantars a feddan against 4 last year. This is due almost entirely to thrips. The American cotton crop of the province is estimated at 1,500 kantars, of which about 1,050 have so far been sold. It was not possible in the time available to supply seed to anything like all possible cultivators, and practically none was issued in Managil. One cultivator, however, got a big issue and sowed 80 feddans, which yielded about 70 kantars. The result has impressed the Managil people immensely, and there is a big demand for seed for next year. From the amount of Baladi cotton sown this year there is a prospect of quite a large crop of American if sufficient seed is distributed.

Red Sea Province.

Tokar Cotton Market.—The large daily arrivals which began late in April continued during May. The total cotton on the market was (in kantars of 100 rottles):—First class, 38,638; second class, 13,655; third class, 450; fourth class, 5. The total for the season is 104,000 kantars of 100 rottles, for which £E194,061 has been paid. The price dropped considerably about the 7th, partly owing to the fall in Liverpool prices, but more owing to the departure of Alexandria buyers from Tokar.

The purchase of 3,000 ardebs of seed for the 1924 crop was completed during the month. It was hoped to start sunning this all at Tokar on May 25, but water transport between Suakin and Trinkitat is very scarce, and up to date only about 500 ardebs have arrived. The Assistant Government Entomologist arrived on the 25th to superintend sunning. The quality of the cotton has remained unusually high for Tokar, over 60 per cent. first class still being obtained daily. Although large tracts in the Delta have ceased to yield, there are still considerable patches of late sown cotton, which should yield up to about June 20.

Berber Province.

Mikeilab Pumping Station Report.—April: 91 kantars were brought into store up to April 30. April—Shendi: The total yield to April 30, 1923, is 1,657 kantars of 315 rotls, an average of 2.68 kantars per feddan. There is still a small quantity to come in. Bouga Pumping Station Report.—April: American cotton yielded 159 kantars this month, giving a total of 1,713 kantars to the end of the month. Sakellarides yielded 23 kantars, giving a total of 160 kantars.

Dongola Province.

Ghaba Pumping Station Report.—April: Cotton received into store totals 1,286 kantars up to April 30, 1923, and represents an average yield of 3.67 kantars per feddan. Gurier Pumping Station Report.—April: Cotton is now finished. The average yield per feddan is 2 kantars. Nuri Pumping Station Report.—April: The cotton has so far yielded 3.5 kantars per feddan, 1,814 kantars have been brought in up to the end of April, and there is still a considerable quantity to be picked.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London,
Tuesday Morning.

The Crisis and Trade.

The statement by the Government with regard to the negotiations with our Allies over the Ruhr and Reparations makes it clear that the pourparlers have so far been productive of negative results. All things considered, it is perhaps not surprising that this should be so, seeing that France and ourselves view the question from very different angles. If France had our trade problem she would doubtless be much more willing to come to a settlement; but she is not experiencing the economic ills with which we are all too familiar and whose incidence promises to be increased as a result of the continuance of the European crisis. Not the least interesting part of Mr. Baldwin's address was his reference to the economic interdependence of nations, and in particular to the sensitiveness of this country to adverse Continental developments. We have had abundant demonstration of that, and one would think it ought by now to be overwhelmingly clear that there cannot be a real trade revival while nations are removed from the economic circle. If Central Europe is not in a position to take jute and other produce from India, then it inevitably follows that the purchasing power that India can devote to Lancashire goods is lessened, and the same applies in the case of Russia as a tea-consuming centre.

The Problem.

Mr. Baldwin gave an interesting example of this process in the case of Chile, pointing out that the inability of Germany to take nitrates from that country is bringing the Chilean international trade to a deadlock. It is, indeed, not difficult to multiply instances of the adverse effect on trade resulting from the present position. That is, unfortunately, only one aspect of the problem. There is, on the other hand, the question of future German competition, which no one who knows Germany's history and is familiar with present-day conditions in Germany can doubt will be inordinately severe. Sooner or later it will have to be faced, and our position in regard to it will be dependent on the extent to which we have been successful in forcing Germany to pay Reparations. That is where the rub comes in, and why one can well understand the attitude of those who counsel the policy of following France into the Ruhr, for unless Germany is made to pay adequate compensation we should compete against her at a hopeless disadvantage, owing to our own deadweight of debt.

Mr. McKenna.

Apparently Mr. Baldwin will have to renew his search for a Chancellor of the Exchequer, for while nothing has been announced on the subject, it is generally understood that Mr. McKenna has decided after all to remain in the City. It is the City's gain, but very decidedly the Government's loss, for the accession to its ranks of Mr. McKenna at the Treasury would have been a very great source of strength. The reason for Mr. McKenna's decision will doubtless be the subject of much speculation, and it may, and possibly quite incorrectly, be assumed that he has not viewed the developments of the Government's political and financial policy since May (when he signified his willingness to accept the post) with unmixed favour. But the reason, whatever it is, is after all quite immaterial and a matter for speculation of much greater interest is the identity of the next Chancellor. Unfortunately, those who would be the most satisfactory choices for the Treasury are too deeply immersed in business responsibilities to be in the running.

A Loss to London Commerce.

It is with great regret that I learn of the death on August 3 of Mr. C. E. Musgrave, for so many years Secretary of the London Chamber of Commerce. Practically the whole of Mr. Musgrave's career was spent in the service of the Chamber, which he joined in 1882 at the age of twenty-one. Two years later he became assistant secretary, and in 1909 secretary. Of Mr. Musgrave's work at the Chamber it would be impossible to speak in too high terms. To his able organisation is very largely due the extension of the influence and sphere of activity of the Chamber, and one can pay no more fitting tribute than to say that through the Chamber he was able to do a great work on behalf of British trade.

Trade with Yugoslavia.

On the whole Captain Murray Harvey's report on Yugoslavia, extracts from which will be found in another column, is quite encouraging as regards the prospects of British trade with that country. In Yugoslavia, as in the other Balkan countries, conditions have unfortunately been very adverse to trade development during the past few years, but in every one of the countries the position is slowly changing for the better, and it is essential that our merchants and manufacturers should remain on the alert to take advantage of the improving outlook. If there is any failure in this respect the markets will simply go to more enterprising rivals, probably Germany, evidences of whose activities in the Near East have been only too frequently available of late.

COMMENTATOR.

DEATH OF MR. CHARLES E. MUSGRAVE.

It is with great regret that we have to announce the death, after a short illness, on August 3, at a nursing home, of Mr. Charles E. Musgrave, F.C.I.S., secretary of the London Chamber of Commerce (Incorporated).

Mr. Musgrave, who was in his 63rd year, entered the service of the London Chamber in 1882, having previously been on the staff of the City Press and the Citizen, of which latter journal he was sub-editor in 1881. He was appointed assistant secretary of the London Chamber of Commerce in 1884 and secretary in 1909 on the retirement of Mr. Kenric B. Murray from that position. Both in connection with and apart from that office, Mr. Musgrave was concerned in many important movements of a national and imperial character. He was secretary of the British Imperial Council of Commerce, an Association of all the Chambers of Commerce in the British Empire, in which capacity he organised the Eighth Congress of Empire Chambers of Commerce in London in 1912, and assisted in organising the Ninth Congress at Toronto in 1920; he was general secretary of the Timber Trades Federation of the United Kingdom and of the London Labour Conciliation and Arbitration Board, and honorary secretary of the British Roumanian Chamber of Commerce. A Fellow of the Chartered Institute of Secretaries, he was elected president of that body for the year 1921-1922. He frequently appeared as a witness before Parliamentary and Departmental Committees and Royal Commissions, and was joint author of a book on the Factory and Workshops Act, 1901. He also wrote a history of the London Chamber of Commerce from 1881 to 1914. Amongst other things he was honorary secretary of the City of London Branch of the Royal Society of St. George (which he assisted in founding), and later vice-chairman of the branch; a Liveryman of the City of London and a member of the Court of the Turners' Company; a Freemason (Authors' Lodge); Chevalier of St. Anne of Russia, conferred upon him by the late Emperor of Russia on the occasion of his visit to Cowes in 1909; and Officer of the Crown of Roumania. Mr. Musgrave's death will be mourned by a wide circle of business and personal friends.

DRIED FRUIT REPORT.

Messrs. J. C. Houghton and Co., of Liverpool, report as follows under date August 1:—

Currants.—The position continues pretty much as described in our last report, and it has been difficult for some time past to apprehend exactly what is influencing the trade in its policy of abstention. The available supplies in first hands on June 30 were extremely light (1,918 tons), and when account is taken of the fact that there were no fresh arrivals during July, and that wholesalers, dealers, and grocers are carrying no stocks, there was justification for the hope that the long-delayed demand would at last materialise. Latterly some anxiety has been manifested by merchants to make progress, and concessions were made to encourage business, but with poor response from buyers, who persist in purchasing only sufficient for their immediate requirements. Where business has been possible it has centred chiefly round cleaned varieties at 56s. to 58s., which marks a decline of about 2s. per cwt. Limited transactions are also recorded in Gulf at 56s. to 58s., Panariti at 60s., Vostizza at 60s. to 65s., and a few fine Smalls at 70s.

Raisins.—Cape, after realising f.a.q. 38s., 40s., g.a.q. 42s., 45s., are easier at 36s. to 38s., following on the decline in Australian Lexias, which are offering at 40s.

Sultanas.—The pronounced downward tendency which developed has not been accompanied by the improved demand which might well have been looked for at the reduced level of values now established. Some excellent fruit of fresh keeping quality was disposed of from 60s. to 65s., which shows a drop of 15s. per cwt., and good ordinary fruit has been pressed for sale at shillings below the figures named without attracting attention, while Greeks at 60s. to 65s. have also failed to elicit any response.

COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY.

ROUMANIA.

Bucharest, July 23.

The Agricultural Position.

The Economist of July 7 publishes an article on the comparative cereal sowings of Roumania and Hungary, and draws the conclusion, from the fact that the sowings in Hungary have decreased during the past three years while those of Roumania have increased, that the agrarian reform in Roumania has on the whole been advantageous, for Hungary still remains "an island of vast estates in a green sea of 'agrarian reform.'" This conclusion, however, hardly appears to be well founded, considering how many other important factors have to be taken into consideration. The area of Roumania has been about doubled since the war, and she has acquired rich agricultural provinces and rich industrial areas, which ought, in the natural course of things, to give a great impetus to her progress. Hungary, on the other hand, has lost some of her richest districts, and has undergone a political revolution, both of which facts have tended to disorganisation. It would, indeed, have said little for Roumania if she had not been able to increase her cereal sowings since 1920, when they fell so very far short even of the normal area sown in Old Roumania before the war. Even today, according to the article of M. Carabella, of the Ministry of Agriculture, quoted last month, there still remain about 1½ million hectares of available grain land unsown in this country. Further, the wheat and rye crops of Hungary have steadily increased since 1920, whereas those of Roumania have decreased, and these are the most valuable crops. The reasons for the decrease of these crops in Roumania are well known: they are (a) the peasant's preference for maize and forage crops, and (b) the Government fixed prices and restrictions on the sale and export of wheat and rye.

Harvest Prospects.

It is not expected that the harvest will be more than an average one. The torrential rains and hailstorms which have occurred during the past month have done a great deal of damage to many of the crops, although the maize has probably benefited rather than otherwise so far. In some districts the vines, fruit, and other crops have been completely destroyed, while in others the losses are less severe. The comparatively small quantity of wheat sown is noticeable as one travels through the country, and the crops of barley and oats are rather thin and short owing to the long drought in the spring up to the end of May. The heat wave has now reached this country, but it has not been so severe as in England and France. It has been accompanied by thunderstorms and heavy rains, which cleared the air, and were often succeeded by a cool wind. Indeed, the longest spell of really hot weather we have had this year was in May. Since then it has been unusually mild, the thermometer (Cent.) having reached only 31° in the shade, whereas 40° is quite common in Bucharest.

Miscellaneous.

The exports are still very limited, only the timber exports showing a tendency to increase. The timber mostly goes to the adjoining countries: Hungary, Turkey, etc.

Following an exchange of Notes between the British and Roumanian Governments, a provisional commercial agreement has been signed on the basis of the most favoured nation clause. This agreement is terminable at three months' notice on either side.

THE INDO-EUROPEAN LINE.

Reopening of through Cable Route.

At noon on August 3, nine years after the outbreak of the Great War, the through cable route of the Indo-European Telegraph Company was reopened for telegraph traffic between the United Kingdom and South Russia, Turkey, Persia, the Persian Gulf, Irak, India, and the Far East. For many reasons the reconstruction of the line has been a most difficult and arduous operation, and the chapter of events which has rendered possible this result deserves to rank high in the history of commercial enterprise.

The line is of very old standing, having been opened to the public as long ago as 1868, and its route, crossing as it does many countries of Europe and Asia, renders it particularly susceptible to interruption in the event of international complications. It is worth while to outline briefly the exact route to illustrate the effects of the war. The line runs across the North Sea and Germany, where it goes by way of Emden and Berlin, whence it runs to Thorn and Warsaw, thence on to Birdichevsk and to Odessa in the Ukraine. From Odessa a branch line runs to Constantinople, while the main line goes on by the north shore of the Black Sea by way of Sebastopol and other ports to Tiflis, Tabriz, and Teheran, the terminus of the company's line proper. At Teheran, however the cable connects up with the double system of land lines and cables of the Indo-European Telegraph Department of the India Office to Karachi. The actual length of the company's sections of the lines is 3,000 miles, and to Karachi about 5,600 miles.

The outbreak of hostilities in 1914 resulted in the immediate interruption of the line, which was one of the first of the cables to be put out of action, the last message going through on July 31. Despite unremitting work on the part of those responsible, it has only now been possible to bring the line again into use—nearly five years after the Armistice, a fact which speaks volumes for the work that has had to be accomplished and the difficulties that have had to be overcome. New agreements have, of course, had to be made with all the countries through which the line runs, a task by no means easy, in view of the confused state of the Continent since the war ended. Then there has been the actual reconstruction of the line, a gigantic task, which has involved in large sections actual construction again from the beginning. Much of the company's lines in Poland and South Russia was either destroyed in the course of actual fighting or disappeared together with much equipment; and even where no disturbance had taken place the enforced inactivity of so many years had its effect on the condition of the lines throughout the whole route. It has been necessary to construct an entirely new line for a distance of about 700 miles, and to expend a great deal of time and material on the repair of the old system. This has been done with great success by the company's chief engineer, Captain Cook, and after the short introductory period which is always necessary for a line to find its level after such a long interruption, it is confidently expected that the company will be able to offer to the public the speedy and reliable service which distinguished it before the war.

If the problems with which the company was confronted as regards the reconstruction of the European sections of the line were serious, those with regard to sections further east were scarcely less difficult. In the Caucasus the line had to be constructed anew, and the process involved all the pioneering work that was required when the line was first constructed. The terrain in that region, it may be pointed out, offers difficulties peculiarly its own, and the reconstruction of that section has been no light feat. The whole work, in fact, has been of an extremely arduous character, and the company is justly entitled to the most wholehearted praise on the successful carrying through of the work necessary to bring the line again into operation.

Before leaving the subject, a few remarks on the working of the line may be of interest. Transmission of telegrams is by direct automatic Wheatstone working throughout, as follows:—From London (Manchester and Liverpool) to Odessa for South Russia and Turkey in Europe and Asia, to Tiflis for the Georgian and Caspian oilfields, and to Tabriz and Teheran for Persia, the Persian Gulf, and Irak. With the co-operation of the Indo-European Telegraph Department telegrams for India and beyond are carried direct between London and Karachi by the same automatic working. This is accomplished by the use of nearly twenty relay stations, at which the signals are automatically reinforced and retransmitted. It will readily be understood, therefore, that after a long period of inactivity a line of this length and description, passing through all varieties of country and climate, requires very careful testing and adjustment before it can be opened with confidence for traffic.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

IMPROVEMENT OF EGYPTIAN HARBOURS

Commendatore Luigi Luiggi, an eminent Italian engineer, who was recently invited by the Egyptian Government to inspect the ports of Alexandria and Suez, has now submitted a report in which he recommends various improvements at both (says Reuter's Cairo Correspondent). He divides the work proposed into three categories, according to urgency.

In the first place he advises the early construction of wharves at some distance from each of the two towns for the loading and unloading of oil, petrol, benzine, etc. In the second category he advises the building of new quays in order that adequate accommodation may be provided for the shipping visiting the two ports. In the third category he proposes the construction of depots and reservoirs for petrol, benzine and coal, and various other improvements.

He estimates the cost of the whole scheme at £E1,700,000 for Alexandria and £E850,000 for Suez, the expenditure to be spread over the seven years which the work would require for its execution.

British Consular Reports.

VI.—YUGOSLAVIA.

The following extracts are taken from the report of Captain E. Murray Harvey, O.B.E., M.C., Commercial Secretary to H.M. Legation, Belgrade, on the economic and industrial conditions in Yugoslavia in 1922 :—

Grain Crop.

Persistent reports were current during 1922 that the harvest would be a very bad one, even worse than that of the preceding year, when the exceptional drought seriously affected almost all crops; but these reports appeared to have originated with the peasant farmers themselves, with the object of keeping up the price of grain, and in reality the harvest of 1922 was an average one.

The Ministry of Agriculture, in an endeavour to compile a reliable report, asked for figures to be sent in from all districts, but many of the local authorities failed to respond, and it was found necessary to despatch expert commissions into the corn-growing regions to investigate and report upon the crops. The result of these investigations was upon the whole satisfactory, and the commission estimated that the principal grain-growing districts would furnish 300,000 waggons (3 million metric tons) of cereals (wheat, barley, rye, and maize), including the grain left in the country from the previous year's harvest.

The following figures were given for the grain crop of 1922 (other than maize) :—Wheat, 1,149,818 tons; rye, 112,850 tons; barley, 222,115 tons; oats, 254,749 tons.

The exportable surplus for 1922 of various kinds of grain was given as follows (in tons) :—Wheat, 143,230; barley, 85,590; oats, 76,090; rye, 88,600; maize, 666,260. To this should be added the surplus of wheat and maize from the 1921 harvest, estimated at 128,000 tons of wheat and 381,850 tons of maize. The quality of the wheat is rather better than that of the previous year. In certain districts which never produce sufficient corn to meet local requirements the harvest this year was almost a total failure, and cereals had to be imported from abroad, as, owing to lack of good communications, supplies could not be brought from the grain-growing districts.

Viticulture.

The 1922 grape crop was exceptionally abundant; but owing to the continuous heavy rains which fell at the time of the vintage, much of the wine will be of inferior quality. The difficulty of finding an outlet for the surplus wine is very severely felt, especially in the Vrsac and Bela Crkva region of the Banat, where excellent wines formerly well-known as Hungarian are produced. This district being situated between Belgrade and the frontiers of Roumania and Hungary, to which countries there is no exportation of wine, must send its produce by rail through Yugoslavia from the east to the extreme west in order to reach foreign markets, and as the costs of transport make the wine too dear there is little business done. Hence the agreement by which Czecho-Slovakia permits the importation of 150,000 hectolitres of Yugoslav wine and Yugoslavia an equal quantity of Czecho-Slovakian beer is not thought to be likely to be of much utility in easing the situation.

The total yield of wine for 1922 was estimated at 13,000,000 hectolitres, of which 3,000,000 hectolitres will probably remain available for export after the needs of home consumption are supplied. The wine growers, in order to make it possible to dispose of their production, have asked that the distillation of the inferior qualities should be allowed free of taxation, and that the railway tariff for the inland transportation of wine should be lowered by 50 per cent. as has been done for the carriage of wine destined for exportation.

The Plum Industry.

The continuous rainfall at the time of gathering the plum-crop was productive of bad results for this staple industry. The fruit brought to the drying stations was frequently swollen by the rains, consequently being heavy, and the peasant growers received good prices for their crop. In order not to lose by too great a reduction in weight some of the prune-preparing firms, it is said, did not sufficiently dry the fruit, and as a result there have been complaints from foreign importers as to the quality of Yugoslavian prunes, which if insufficiently dried will not stand a long journey. Great efforts were and are still being made by the Ministry of Agriculture and other interested bodies to standardise the preparation and packing of prunes, by official supervision from the gathering of the fruit until its despatch. It is estimated that about 40,000 tons of prunes were produced in 1922, of which some 20,000 tons are said to have been exported, leaving about 10,000 tons still available for exportation.

Opium Production.

Less opium was grown in 1922 than in the previous year, the crop being estimated at 15,000 to 20,000 kilogrammes; but since prices are now much higher (800 to 900 dinars per oka, as compared with 60 to 70 dinars per oka in 1921), the peasants of Serbian Macedonia are said to be preparing to grow more papaver somnifera in 1923. Almost all the opium produced is exported through Salonika, the trade being entirely in the hands of the Greek merchants.

Beet Sugar Industry.

Great efforts are being made to develop this industry by the "Savez Fabrika Secera" (Union of Sugar Factories), Belgrade, which carries on intensive propaganda to popularise the growing of sugar beet by the peasants. Books and pamphlets in many languages descriptive of the best methods of growing beet and the advantages of this crop are distributed gratis to the peasants; the latest types of agricultural implements suited to beet-farming are lent free of charge to the farmers; and further inducements consisting in advances of cash on account of future crops are offered. The partition of large estates under the agrarian reform law has resulted in a reduction of the amount of beet grown. Sixty to seventy thousand tons of sugar are said to be required annually in Yugoslavia, and it is thought that this amount could easily be produced in the country; the yield for 1922 has been estimated at from 30,000 to 35,000 tons, and the balance will be imported mostly from Czecho-Slovakia (cube sugar) and from Java and America (granulated sugar). The greater part of the machinery and plant in use in the eight sugar factories in Yugoslavia is of Czecho-Slovakian origin; many of the skilled workers employed in the sugar industry are also Czecho-Slovakian.

The Timber Trade.

It is the general opinion that the timber trade has had a disappointing year, but at the same time it must be remembered that timber is the principal article of the Yugoslav export trade. During the first part of the year export was fairly good, and more business could have been done if communications had been better, but later the great fluctuations in the value of the dinar made business very difficult, and it is stated that much foreign trade was lost from this cause. Timber is exported to Italy, Egypt, Switzerland, and France, the latter country being now a regular customer for Yugoslav oak, owing to the low exchange. There is a small trade with Spain, mostly in pine, through the Italian ports. A small quantity of timber has gone to Great Britain, Greece, Belgium, and Holland. The most important customer is now Italy, a fact which is partly explained by the circumstance that the territory which supplied the Italian import trade prior to the War has now passed from Austro-Hungarian into Yugoslav possession (Vojvolina, Croatia, Slovenia, and Bosnia). Roumanian competition is keenly felt in the interior, import merchants having bought largely from Transylvania and the Roumanian Banat, as well as in the trade with the Levant. Figures are not yet available for the whole year, but during the first half of 1922 timber up to the value of 252,000,000 dinars was exported.

Exports.

For the eleven months of 1922 for which figures are available, the value of Yugoslavia's exports amounted to 2,850,000,000 dinars, so that the total for the year can be put at about 3,000,000,000 dinars. Prunes took first place among the articles exported, the second being occupied by timber for constructional purposes. The exportation of cattle and meat products decreased, owing mainly to the hesitation of the Government in the matter of fixing the tariff for the export of swine. In November, the month during which, ordinarily, the swine are mostly exported, there was very little of this trade done. The export of wheat and maize was at that time subject to a very high tariff (since lowered), and therefore practically non-existent. As a consequence there were few foreign drafts available on the bourse, and this fact contributed to the depreciation of the dinar.

Trade with Great Britain.

During 1922, trade with Great Britain, for several reasons, fell short of expectations. It was partly a period of transition during which the fall in prices came at last to an end and a rise began. The dinar depreciated rapidly; retailers were not in a financial position to carry such heavy stocks as usual, with the result that the wholesale merchants imported less, and both traders and the general public refrained from purchasing more than the minimum in anticipation of a further reduction in prices. During the latter part of the year the measures taken to "peg" the dinar were such as to restrict importation, and they did, in fact, for a time, make the purchase of goods abroad almost impossible. In one or two articles such as copper, which is largely used for the manufacture of stills, etc., tin, which is used in the casting of bells to replace those taken from the churches during the War and for bearing-metal, and in tin-plates, a fair amount of business has been transacted. The present position shows more promise. Many of these irksome restrictions upon traffic in foreign exchange which made import trade very difficult have been removed; and conditions have become more normal. Provided a merchant has sufficient capital and is satisfied with a reasonable profit, there is now good business to be done. The demand for woollen textiles, while not remarkable, is steady and on the increase; and certain cotton goods, such as linings and voiles, are also in better demand.

The competition of other countries in this market may be said to be less severe. The Czech crown remains stable and goods of Czecho-Slovakian origin are, comparatively speaking, dear; and countries with greatly depreciated exchanges quote in "sound" valuta. For instance, German manufacturers usually quote in sterling or Swiss francs; their prices for many commodities have lately increased enormously; to mention but one example, quotations for iron tubing; these are made in foreign currencies, and have recently increased 60 per cent. in price. Hungarian manufacturers now also make their quotations in dollars, pounds, or Swiss francs.

With regard to methods of approaching the Yugoslav market, it can only be repeated that, generally speaking, the best method of introducing new kinds of goods is to provide approved agents with local stocks. The Yugoslav merchants are very conservative and possibilities are very remote of booking orders with new customers for "goods to arrive against sterling credits opened in London," or "payment in sterling against documents." It is, however, not easy to find agents who are able and willing to devote much time to the introduction of new goods.

ROUMANIAN DEBTORS.

In the House of Lords on July 31 Lord Fairfax of Cameron asked His Majesty's Government if their attention had been called to a law the Roumanian Government had passed to enable Roumanian debtors to postpone the payment of their debts to British traders, thus overruling judgments that had been obtained by British firms in the Roumanian courts; whether various foreign Governments had protested against this law, and whether any protest had been made by His Majesty's Government.

The Earl of Clarendon, who replied, said that owing to the continued fall in the exchange value of Roumanian currency and the misplaced confidence in its recovery by the Roumanians, a considerable commercial indebtedness had undoubtedly been incurred to traders in this country, and the debtors had found themselves unable to provide the amount of Roumanian currency required to liquidate the amount of their debts in sterling. A series of schemes for dealing with the question had been elaborated in the course of the preceding twelve months, but, unfortunately, without result. Finally, the Roumanian Chamber of Commerce of Bucharest decided to send over a delegation to France, Switzerland, and Great Britain to represent the Roumanian debtors and try to arrive at a satisfactory solution. At the beginning of this year the delegation contracted agreements with representative bodies of creditors in this country under the auspices of the Manchester and London Chambers of Commerce for the settlement of debts contracted between November 11, 1918, and December 31, 1921. These agreements, which were substantially the same, provided for the immediate payment by the Roumanian debtors of about 20 per cent. of the debts and the liquidation of the remainder of the debts by instalments over a minimum period of twelve years and a maximum period of twenty years. The agreements were subject to ratification and subsequent legislation by the Roumanian Government, and in June a law was passed purporting to ratify the agreements. When this law came to be examined, it was found that it differed in certain respects from the arrangements previously made in this country. Accordingly, opportunity was taken by the British creditors of the recent visit here of the Roumanian Finance Minister to discuss the whole question with him, and before he left England the Finance Minister gave certain assurances to the effect that the terms of the agreements entered into should prevail. H.M. Minister at Bucharest had received instructions to obtain confirmation from the Roumanian Government of these assurances. It was confidently hoped, therefore, that before many months had elapsed a satisfactory solution of the whole of this question would be arrived at. He understood that the Italian and French Ministers at Bucharest had lodged diplomatic protests against the law, mainly on the ground that French and Italian debtors were not parties to the agreements.

Lord Newton said there had seldom been a greater condemnation of the good faith and honesty of a so-called friendly and Allied Government than was disclosed in this case. It was the Roumanian Government, responsible for this dishonest legislation, which was at this moment holding up the whole financial settlement of Central Europe by reason of its obstruction in the matter of Hungarian reparations. He hoped his noble friend would hold the Government to the statement they had made.

OIL NOTES AND NEWS.

Oilfields of Egypt.

At the general meeting of the Oilfields of Egypt the chairman, Mr. Francis Allen, dealt at length with the position with regard to the company's areas in Egypt. As regards the Ras Dhib area, the company sank wells some few hundred feet without finding oil in paying quantities. The company's technical advisers suggested going down to further depths, at which it was anticipated that the Nubian sandstone would be reached. Drilling was, therefore, continued past the 2,000 ft. limit, and on the way down small shows of gas and oil were encountered, sufficient to encourage the hope that there was something worth going for.

"But none of those shows," Mr. Allen added, "materialised. At one time the staff were particularly confident, because they were passing through a formation which was said to conform to the Hurghada formation. They were very hopeful at that time, and we, too, were very much encouraged. However, their hope did not materialise; they sank deeper and reached the point at which they expected to cut the Nubian sandstone without obtaining oil. We might have gone deeper still, but there were various technical difficulties in the way of deep drilling, and our technical advisers, therefore, after careful consideration, advised us that they did not think it would be wise to proceed."

The Ras Bahar Field.

Turning to the Ras Bahar field, Mr. Allen pointed out that they had a well down to a considerable depth. It was mentioned in the report that they were seeing whether they could raise sufficient money to put the well down to the necessary depth—probably 4,000 ft. A telegram just received from the company's manager in Egypt stated that he had received a proposal from an Egyptian syndicate enabling the company to complete Ras Bahar borehole No. 3 on terms which he thought the company could accept. Mr. Allen added that they had not yet received a letter from their manager referred to in the message; but as he was in full possession of their views with regard to Ras Bahar, they were fairly confident that the arrangement was on terms which were fairly satisfactory to themselves.

Mr. Allen proceeded to quote the opinion of Mr. Cunningham Craig in regard to Ras Bahar:—

I am of opinion that a new deep test should be made here, and I have indicated to Mr. Macdonald a location within a hundred yards of the eastern boundary of the concession. . . . The well should be carried to 4,000 ft. This will be an expensive test, and it is admittedly speculative, but the reward of success will be far greater than at Ras Dhib.

That the Nubian sandstone is petroliferous in this neighbourhood is obvious . . . and a success in that area (Ras Bahar) will undoubtedly mean large production and the proving of a field that should be large enough to contain at least 60 wells.

"We have always wanted to carry out this test," said Mr. Allen, "and see if Mr. Craig's predictions are correct. If they were proved to be so it would alter the whole position of this company. In suggesting that we are going on with this borehole, I should like to say that there is no question but that drilling for oil in Egypt generally has not proved very successful, as the country is very much broken up by upheavals, which took place at various remote periods. Therefore. I suggest to the shareholders that, although we shall do our best to put this borehole down—and we are distinctly hopeful about it—they should not count too much upon it, because we are not justified in feeling too confident. I dare say I may be regarded as a pessimist in saying that, but it is much wiser to tell shareholders plainly that there are considerable risks in connection with these things than to hold out hopes which may not be fulfilled."

CATTLE DISEASE IN IRAK.

The Veterinary Bulletin of Irak for April gives the following particulars:—

Rinderpest, the most formidable cattle plague of the East, again exacted a heavy toll among the cattle in the Baghdad, Amara, Dulaim, and Diala Liwas, outbreaks occurring as far north as Hit and south to the Muqata of Shaikh Shawai in Amara. One hundred and fifty-eight head of cattle died before veterinary aid could be rendered. Altogether 1,500 animals were inoculated with anti-rinderpest serum. This serum is remarkably efficacious, enabling the protection of all cattle in the areas exposed to infection. Early notification of the existence of disease is essential, but it is to be regretted that failure to report cases still occurs, with the inevitable loss of stock and spread of the disease.

A serious epidemic of anthrax broke out among sheep and cattle in the Hilla Liwa. The principal places affected were Na'amiyah, Abu Jamus, in the Nahiya of Kifl. Three hundred deaths occurred from the disease. During the past three years this disease has been comparatively rare. The outbreak is to be regretted, as, apart from the loss of stock and the danger to human life through handling of the skin and wool, a large grazing area will be infectious for all animals for many months to come.

AGRICULTURE IN MOROCCO.

The following extracts are taken from a report of Mr. C. E. Heathcote Smith, British Consul at Casablanca, on the agricultural outlook in the French zone of Morocco:—

After the pessimism induced in the early part of the year by the prolonged drought, an excessive optimism appears to have been indulged in consequent upon the late but heavy rains in March and April.

The Protectorate official report on present prospects states that the harvest of soft wheat is almost completed. The first results show the harmful effects of the sirocco in May. In the Abda (Saffi) soft wheat will only yield a quarter of the quantity estimated in April by the farmers; though in this case it is a question of grain grown without spring ploughing. In the Doukkala (Mazagan), Chacuia (Casablanca), and Rabat regions, the damage, though considerable, is less. Around Meknez, too, results are below those estimated in April; but at Fez and Tadla they are slightly in excess of expectations. Hard wheat suffered less from the action of the warm winds. Taken as a whole, the wheat crop is average in yield, but in view of the considerable extension of land brought under wheat, there will be important quantities available for exportation, which will justify the estimates presented at the time of the preparation of the Presidential Decree fixing the amounts to be admitted into France in the 1923-24 season. These amounts included:—Wheat, 800,000 quintals; barley, 500,000 quintals; oats, 120,000 quintals; beans, 200,000 quintals; maize, 200,000 quintals; Canary seed, 30,000 quintals.

The barley harvest is complete. Although it is of only fair to average, it will exceed the April estimates by about 30,000 tons. Oats have given excellent results. The average yield for all Morocco has proved to be about 1.2 tons per hectare, as against the April estimate of 1.17.

The year 1922-23 will show on the whole average results, but the considerable increase in wheat and barley sowings will enable the estimated quantities to be exported.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Dull and Weak.

The Commercial Company of Egypt in their report for the week ended July 27 state :—

Since our last report, the futures market has been very dull and the undertone distinctly weak. The principal reasons for this week's weakness is the acute trade depression existing more or less all over the world, and the continued good news received on the progress of the American and Egyptian crops. We do not look for the time being for any appreciable change in the present level of prices; however, we must not ignore the fact that we are now in the critical period of the growing crops, when the markets are very easily influenced should unfavourable conditions develop. The signing of the Lausanne Treaty will undoubtedly create a brighter atmosphere in commercial circles in the Near East, and it is hoped that trade and industrial activity will revive shortly in those countries which have suffered so many calamities during recent years. This week's receipts amounted to 475 krs., and the total since September 1 now stands at 6,630,352 krs. Exports have this week amounted to 31,554 krs., and the stock now stands at 1,095,532 krs., against 1,126,611 krs. a week ago, and 1,668,648 krs. a year ago.

Spot: Owing to the Kourban Bairam holidays we have had a short week at Minet el Bassal. The market has been very quiet, and sales amount for the three business days to about 1,650 bales, of which we estimate 1,000 bales Sakellarides and 650 bales Uppers, with a few bales of outside growths. Spinners continue to show little interest in our market, and the demand is poor.

Sakellarides: All grades have been dealt in. Prices of spot against contracts are generally a little dearer, good fair markedly so, the spot not having followed the decline in contracts.

Uppers: All styles have changed hands. Prices of spot against contracts are generally rather dearer than last week, except in the high grades, which are without change.

Brown and white are neglected, and only a few bales have changed hands. Prices of spot against contracts are dearer than last week, especially for white.

Crop 1923: News from the interior on the progress of the plants continues satisfactory; water is ample everywhere and the temperature favourable.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Falling Off in Demand for Egyptian.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended August 1 :—

The demand for Egyptian cotton has shown a further falling off during the past week. The continued weakness of the American markets could hardly be expected to stimulate buying, and until to-day we have witnessed an all-round easier tendency in spot prices. To-day, however, a more buoyant feeling developed, as a result of the unlooked-for strength of the Alexandria market, the latter being due entirely to the fact that the Egyptian Government had announced its decision to support the market—in what way or to what extent is not yet clear. Whatever opinions may be held as to the advisability of Government intervention, it has certainly "stopped the rot" for the time being. Only a small amount of buying has so far been attracted by the sudden rise, most spinners remaining sceptical as to its permanence. It should be borne in mind, however, that the American markets have been forced back a considerable way in the last ten days or so, and a reaction at any time now would surprise nobody. A combination of the two circumstances might cause a sharp upward movement in Egyptian cotton, that would make to-day's prices, 14.70 for November, look very attractive.

Last week's stock-taking in Liverpool has revealed a further decrease of approximately 6,000 bales, making the total here to-day (say) 82,000 bales, as against (say) 92,000 bales on the same date last year, a decrease of approximately 10,000 bales. There is doing, of course, and has been doing for some time now, a much bigger spot business this year than there was during the corresponding months of 1922, and yet the price of Egyptian cotton to-day is nearly 4½d. per lb. cheaper than it was in July last year. The demand during the week has been chiefly for Sakellaridis cotton, at prices ranging from 100 to 175 points on November contracts. A little more inquiry has been noticeable for the better cotton up to about "250 on." Uppers have been rather at a discount again, and what inquiry there was has been satisfied with medium grades. The usual inquiries for low cotton continue, and White Sudan, about "150 on," has also been in request. Brown cotton and Tokar Sakellaridis have been neglected..

C.i.f. business has been transacted spasmodically here and there, but, for the most part, requirements are met more cheaply out of stock in Liverpool. New crop news continues to be favourable. Forwardings to spinners for the week ending 27th ult. were returned as 6,430 bales. Total sales 3,800 (includes 300 Sudan). Quotations of Sakel are reduced 15 points, those of Upper and Brown 5 points, on the week. Fully Good Fair Sakel to-day, 15.35d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Rise in Raw Cotton Prices.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended August 4 states :—

The market has been somewhat disorganised during the past week, owing to the unexpected nature of the American Agricultural Bureau's report on the growing crop. This was issued on Wednesday evening, and gave the condition as 67.2 per cent. as compared with 69.9 per cent. a month ago, thus showing a reduction where an increase had been confidently expected. The report was regarded with a certain amount of incredulity in Manchester, but the effect was to raise substantially raw cotton prices, which for some days previously had been falling rather rapidly; at the same time it upset any negotiations which were in progress here.

Yarn.—The fluctuations referred to above in the price of raw cotton have had a disturbing effect, and at the moment it is difficult to fix a basis of yarn values, quotations being very irregular. There is no improvement to record in the general state of affairs, the Egyptian section being now decidedly less active than a little while ago.

Cloth.—There was perhaps a little more inquiry in this section in the early days of the week, but the publication of the Bureau report brought negotiations almost to a standstill. Markets abroad remain in a lethargic state, and there has not yet been time for the hoped-for demand from the Levant to materialise.

Raw Cotton.—The Bureau report has been referred to above, and was followed by heavy buying in New York and Liverpool, which, however, did not carry the price as high as it was before the recent break. The crop is now estimated at 11,500,000 bales. The carry-over at July 31 is said to be about 2,500,000 bales, as compared with 4,920,000 bales a year ago and 9,914,000 bales in 1921. Closing prices are as follows :—American Fully Middling, 13.86; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 15.85.

For the quarter ended March, Palestine's imports amounted in value to £E1,246,661.

The production of hard coal in Czecho-Slovakia in 1922 amounted to 99,062,610 quintals, while the production of lignite was 189,420,202 quintals.

The traffic receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways for the ten days ended July 10 amounted to £E7,104, making the total from April 1 £E64,059, as compared with £E78,589 for the corresponding period of the previous year.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Turkish Democracy at Work.

This week sees the new Turkish democracy settling down to serious work. Hitherto the stress of foreign affairs has stultified, or at least thrown a cloak of artificiality over, home politics in Turkey. Now, however, the Lausanne Conference is at an end; the new Turkish Assembly has been convened, and the Constitution, drafted in the first instance with one eye on Moscow, and not altogether without thought for its effect on Europe, can be reconsidered in the light of a brief experience and with a single mind for Turkey's own interests. It is a satisfactory sign that Ismet Pasha's work at Lausanne appears to have won for him the gratitude of his fellow-countrymen. Mustapha Kemal Pasha's position may be for the moment unchallengeable; but the best thing that could happen for Turkey would be that he should be able to rely upon the support, whether as Ministers or not, of a number of others whose authority also carries weight in the country. The problem with which the Turkish nation is confronted at this stage is far too formidable for the responsibility of solving it to rest on the shoulders of one man alone, however able he may be. The form of administration is of secondary importance; "whate'er is best administered is best." More than half of Turkey's administrative battle would be won if she could secure honesty in her Government; efficiency could follow by gradual steps. With half a dozen men grouped round him whose resolve to establish a tradition of honesty in the administration was proof against the Turkish failing of laissez faire, Mustapha Kemal Pasha would have an easier task ahead of him than if he has no one to turn to except a number of Commissaries who may owe their office to log-rolling in the Assembly.

The Macedonian Question.

The two outstanding factors in connection with the Macedonian question are that the agitation for autonomy is not going to be suppressed easily and that only a Government of madmen in Sofia would deliberately encourage the Macedonians at this particular juncture. From what was known of the Macedonian organisation it was to be inferred that the fall of the Stambolisky régime would be followed by a revival of Macedonian activity. In accordance with his policy of cultivating friendly relations with his neighbours, the late Prime Minister had damped down the embarrassing agitation to such good effect that the Macedonians realised that before they could get to business again on their programme they would have to eliminate M. Stambolisky from the Bulgarian Government. They probably have no right to take any credit for the coup d'état of June 9, but they have not been slow to profit by it, and the new Government is naturally unwilling to antagonise the powerful Macedonian organisation before it is firmly established in power. Accordingly there have been Macedonian demonstrations in Sofia, for which the Bulgarian Government will inevitably be held responsible by its neighbours. A moment's consideration, however, will show that a Government in the position of M. Zankoff's Cabinet has nothing to gain by a recrudescence of Macedonian activity. No body of men capable of the work that resulted in the downfall of M. Stambolisky would willingly ride for their own destruction a few weeks after taking office. The difficulties of the situation are conspicuous enough, and it is in the interests of the Balkan Peninsula as a whole that Bulgaria should be given time to judge the new men on their political merits without having their position complicated by foreign representations.

Solution by Negotiation.

From the Macedonians' own point of view it would be well if they could be brought to see that they are likely to gain more by holding their hand for a period than by trying to prejudice the Bulgarian Government. Their cause has gained little from the methods hitherto adopted. They may think that it is only owing to those methods that it is now recognised as a cause at all. On the other hand, Bulgaria has made her claim to an outlet on the Ægean Sea also a "cause," without any violent measures, and although no success has yet attended the efforts to reach the end in view, no Bulgarian despairs of an ultimate settlement. The Macedonian problem is entirely separate from that of the Ægean outlet; but it is also part of the Near Eastern question, as it now stands, and has a much better chance of obtaining a satisfactory solution by peaceful negotiations than by indiscriminate excesses. These might, indeed, in the long run attain their end, on the analogy of other revolutionary movements, but hardly before the greater part of the Macedonians have been wiped out. One of the first tasks of the Sofia Government, therefore, would seem to be to make an arrangement with the Macedonians in Bulgaria that all agitation should be discountenanced for a certain time to give the Government an opportunity of bringing the question before the League of Nations. It would promote the cause of peace in the Balkans, if at the same time the Yugoslav Government could try to eliminate all causes for agitation among the Macedonians in Serbia whose alleged disabilities help to keep alive the agitation among Macedonians in Bulgaria.

The Arabs of Palestine.

It is good news that six of the ten Arabs nominated to the Advisory Council have agreed to accept office. Shortly before Sir Herbert Samuel's departure from Palestine on leave it was reported that all the nominees had refused to serve: but it was more correct to say that they had made their acceptance of office conditional upon their being satisfied that membership of the Council would not commit them to approval of the Constitution. Negotiations on this subject have been in progress for several weeks with the Acting High Commissioner, Sir Gilbert Clayton, with the satisfactory result now reported. It goes without saying that attempts will be made by Arab extremists to force the Councillors to resign; but it is hoped that one and all will remain proof against threats or cajolery. There can be no question that Arab interests can be served better by Arab representation on the Council than by a foolish policy of abstention. If the Palestinian Arabs want an illustration of this fact, they need not go farther afield than Cyprus, where the Greeks have realised their mistake in boycotting the Legislative Council. The main lines of British policy in Palestine are very clear; there will be no yielding to threats, but there will be a gradual devolution of authority. If the Arabs show administrative ability, the process of devolution will be much more rapid than if they sulk in ineffective opposition. The men who have already accepted office have given evidence of their patriotism and commonsense.

Dangers of a Bad Example.

Arab political unrest may not be entirely responsible for all the raiding and brigandage which is now rife in Syria and Palestine; but there can be little doubt that the latter are encouraged by the tribesmen's knowledge that their kinsfolk in these countries are at strife with the powers that be. Turkish intrigue also plays a part, as it has been an axiom at Angora that dissatisfaction with France's attitude at Lausanne can best be shown by making things as uncomfortable as possible for the French in Syria. With the signature of peace this state of affairs should cease, although it may be some time before the effect of better counsels at Angora is felt on the Syrian frontier. The point for the Arabs to bear in mind is that their own kinsfolk are in the end the chief losers from brigandage and general unrest. The opening up of communications in the Middle East will give great impetus to trade, if a reasonable measure of security can be guaranteed on the new routes, and Arab merchants and traders will benefit. Both in Syria and Palestine, therefore, the only patriotic course to adopt is to seek redress for grievances by strictly constitutional means. The strongest possible case against a Mandatory Power will have been made when it can be shown that loyal co-operation and constitutional methods have availed nothing for the removal of disabilities.

Abyssinia.

Any lingering doubts as to the necessity of revising our ideas of the extent to which Western political theories have become acclimatised in the East must be removed by the announcement that Ras Tafari, Regent of Abyssinia, has applied for the admission of his country to the League of Nations. The application is a very shrewd move, and the Regent is to be congratulated on his political wisdom. Abyssinia has lately been rather prominent in the public eye in Great Britain owing to reports of a recrudescence of the slave traffic. Apart from the fact that slavery exists in the country, there is a conflict of evidence as to the extent to which a fresh lease of life has been given to the traffic in slaves since the death of the Emperor Menelek. Conditions in the country—in particular, the weakening of the central authority, have been favourable to the evil; but the Regent claims to have taken steps to restrict slave-raiding, even if he has not been able to stop the practice altogether. If Abyssinia is granted admission to the League of Nations, the Government will have an interest in having the facts regarding the slave traffic properly investigated. At the same time, the Regent may hope to protect himself against any State that shows signs of aiding its nationals too zealously in the exploitation of Abyssinia's resources. The country is in need of development; but, in company with other Eastern peoples, the Abyssinians will probably prefer to choose their own pace and to arrange for the maximum benefit to themselves arising from the development.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

The English Channel.

During the last few days the Channel has been both won and almost lost. Two swimmers have successfully crossed it; but the British Government has not been able so to cross it. With the publication this morning of their Note to the French Government one felt indeed that the darkest hour was on us, that the old gulf so gallantly bridged during the War was once more yawning between England and France. For there is no mistaking the strength, weight, and seriousness of the British Note. After disputing the legality of the Ruhr occupation and reminding the French of their unpaid debt to us, the Note goes boldly on to talk of the possibility of "separate action."

It is claimed that the Government, whatever they do, will have a united nation behind them. Personally I doubt it. There are still thousands of British people who do not enjoy Mr. Baldwin's apparent faith in the goodness of German intentions, and who, therefore, support the French view. But, apart from this fact, is "separate action" at all possible? Is there anything which our Government can really do? In all our newspapers which support the Government in its resolve to take "proper steps" I have seen no hint as to what such steps are actually to be. It would seem that England now cannot direct: it can but drift.

The European Situation.

There is little point in seeking to minimise the gravity of the present situation in Europe, still less in denying our own impotence as a nation in the face of it. For that is what the Ruhr business has brought us to—a state of hopeless impotence. On the Continent our counsels (that is, the counsels of Mr. Baldwin's Government) do not count in any considerable quarter; our advice falls on deaf ears; our intentions are proclaimed without causing any apparent alarm.

The outlook is indeed black. What will happen if, as is confidently, or rather fearfully, hoped here—and business firms with branches in both England and France have already changed their moneys as a precaution—the French franc goes over the hundred, it is impossible to foretell. Equally obscure is the future, from our own point of view, if resistance in the Ruhr ceases, and the political disintegration of Germany begins. England, as a statement of sad fact, is nowhere in the matter; and it may be years before she regains the prestige on the Continent which was hers before Mr. Lloyd George undermined it.

That we shall, as a consequence of fundamental disagreement with France, soon or ever relapse into a state of isolation, hoping by that means to escape Continental problems, I can scarcely believe. If we thus ran away, we should certainly find the black shadows of Europe chasing us more thickly and faster. We might, of course, seek to obtain new alliances, but that would be a very expensive and degrading course. In short, the conviction is forced home again on one that our European policy must approach more nearly that of France, and that our business interests must, therefore, yield to our political interests. Those who say (and in theory they are right) that that is putting the cart before the horse have yet to prove that the chariot they fain would drive would, in fact, progress at all.

Agricultural Depression.

To one who has recently passed through some of the corn-bearing districts of England, and has observed the promise of a rich harvest, the melancholy wail which marked the Press of the last week was surprising. Less land than ever, it seems, is under cultivation, and though the harvest this year may indeed be good, there is no certainty that corn-growing will prove profitable to the farmer. Fruit, moreover, has been a ghastly failure. The position of British agriculture is to be discussed at the forthcoming Imperial Conference, and some attempt is to be made to save the situation. The only alternative—and a disastrous one from a national point of view—is to let the land go to grass.

This must be the true situation. But to look at the wheat in Hertfordshire, for example, which county, incidentally, used to grow, and still does grow, for all I know, more corn per acre than any county in England, or the barley in Norfolk, one can hardly believe the dismal tale.

Summer Schools.

Both Liberals and Conservatives have been wringing the sponges of their minds during the last week, but whereas the Liberals placed their summer-school in the diffuse atmosphere of Cambridge, the Conservatives found closer contact with reality at Wilton, near Salisbury. These summer-schools are commonly supposed to do good, as showing what enormous intelligences repose in either party; but finding ideas of any merit is real research work. At Cambridge, Mr. J. M. Keynes for the Liberals naturally went off the deep-end—if he can be dogmatic in The Times, in his own hearth he soars to intolerable heights of pontificism. He talked about control of the currency, and one hopes that his audience of little Liberals could follow him with more intelligence than the public could read the report of his paper. Mr. Asquith discoursed on the Ruhr, and created considerable alarm by omitting to discuss the question of the legality of the Ruhr, contenting himself with saying that it was "wholly impolitic." There is certainly life in Mr. Asquith; but this is rather in spite of his political tenets than because of them. For the Liberals are the dullest, unreallest people now talking any sense. Lord Hugh Cecil, at the Conservative School, got them off neatly when, after dividing them into bad Liberals and good Liberals, he said that good Liberals were really Conservatives who had not quite found out that they were Conservatives. It is, of course, a discovery that they will never make, because they are too old to go on so long and profitless a voyage of exploration.

The Slave State.

But while, as I have suggested, these political Conferences cut little ice and are but genially reported in the Press, the Congress that did wake the papers from their heat-induced sleep was the National Congress of Roman Catholics at Birmingham. I do not mean that any religious fervour was aroused in the breasts of our atheistic journals, though the decision of Cardinal Bourne not to form a Catholic Party on the lines of the Continental models was favourably remarked; but what did really appear to sting them was the obvious statement by Mr. G. K. Chesterton that the world is on the threshold of another slave State. The theory that modern industrial States are developing into servile States was stated by Mr. Hilaire Belloc before the War, and though it has been contradicted it has never been overthrown. The point is that the modern business contract between master and man tends to guarantee security at the expense of freedom, and a slavery, decent if you like, comfortable, and perhaps unrecognisable by the slave, is the result. But sheets so far apart from each other as the Morning Post and Evening Standard will have none of this, seeking consolation in such high irrelevances as that slaves do not watch football matches or go on holidays. They are grossly material, our newspapers; the psychical does not appeal to them, except as matter for "stunting."

Entrants to Journalism.

It is a truism, though none outside the profession will believe it, that there is little money in journalism. The average journalist is a very hard-working dog; and he views the helter-skelter struggle of outside people to get themselves into print both with pity and dismay. A quite extraordinary number of people, however, are to-day practising journalism: everyone has his favourite journalistic clergyman, doctor, and judge. But one can scarcely say that the Church and medicine have unloaded their choicest gems on our papers.

And now, it seems, the Bar is to descend into print. The last legal year is said to have been financially the worst on record, and the poor barristers are trying to persuade editors that their pens are as worthy instruments as their glib tongues used in better times to be. Others, not so transparently dishonest as this, are giving up their jobs altogether and are going into commerce, which seems to be the only really paying thing nowadays.

The "Proms."

The annual Promenade Concerts of Sir Henry Wood and Mr. Robert Newman began at the Queen's Hall on Saturday, and will continue until October, as usual. These "Proms." have very much changed their character since they were started nearly thirty years ago, and have now attained such a decent level that they should not be missed by any intelligent visitor to London. It is true that the insidious beastly head of commerce is rather extensively displayed in the programmes, but the shop ballads are always performed in the second half of the programme, so that the self-respecting listener can rely on two hours' music (less or more) before he is compelled before the oncoming shadow of Messrs. Chappell to withdraw. September is probably the best month in which to go to the "Proms."—where, incidentally, one should always get a seat, for no one for long can stand and attentively listen—because by that time the band is well together, and is not yet jaded.

An Executive Committee of the Parbandhak (Sikh Shrines) Committee has appointed a working committee to draw up a scheme for agitating among the Sikhs for the reinstatement of the Maharaja of Nabha. Already appeals have been issued in the Amritsar district calling for patriotic Akalis to register their names as willing to suffer for the cause.

The New Turkey.

In the Manchester Guardian of August 2 a "correspondent lately in Constantinople" writes on "Turkey To-day." He refers to the sympathy and encouragement given during the last eighteen months to the struggle by Turkey for national sovereignty, and says that for his part he cannot indulge in it. His reasons are simple: "In every department of government or statecraft in which the Turk has declared that his sovereign rights must prevail he has shown in the recent past, and is still making it more evident, that his methods are corrupt, untrustworthy, and inefficient in the highest degree." Her army, moreover, has completely disintegrated, and "as a military Power the new Turkey differs little from the old."

As to Turkey's working of her own laws, it is sufficient to mention the farce that the attempt to introduce prohibition has brought about. Further, the new "Parliamentary system" in Turkey is the same as that obtaining in all Balkan countries—it is invariably at the mercy of anyone sufficiently strong to bend it to his own purposes. In short, this writer believes that, in spite of evidence to the contrary, under the polished Oriental who seeks admission to the League of Nations lies the real, savage Turk:—

> The traditions of 1453 die hard, and everywhere it is the Orient that breaks through the frock-coats and the stately gentility of the Ottoman. The country is consumed not with a pan-Islamic frenzy, but with a nationalistic spirit that combines the defects of Chauvinism with the dangers of bigotry. What little religious influence there originally was in Kemal's schism is mostly eliminated. The movement is now primarily political, and has recently begun to take upon itself a strong financial flavour. A large majority of the deputies of Angora have direct interests in the concessions about which so much polemic has raged. The religious fervour of the earlier days of the movement is over.
> Those who have so eloquently pleaded the cause of the new Turkey must pause and look at what the real new Turkey is. They have brought into the world the most dreadful Frankenstein that the world has seen since the Treaty of Versailles. But it has not yet begun to move. Its creators have, indeed, assumed a deep responsibility. Already the Balkans are astir. Alliance and rearrangement are spoken of in every Balkan chancellery, and all is unrest once more. The seeds of "sovereign rights" and "nationalism" will be reaped as a grim harvest of war and massacre in all too short a time.

Mr. Dowson's Retirement.

Mr. Dowson is shortly retiring from the position of Financial Adviser, and it is reported that his successor is to be Mr. R. S. Patterson, until May of last year Adviser to the Ministry of Education. Mr. Patterson is very popular with Egyptians with whom he has come into contact, and reports of his being a likely candidate for the Financial Adviserships have given much satisfaction.

The Dispute with the Hejaz.

The Arabic Press, which usually goes wild with delight over a fresh opportunity for journalistic vitriol, but drops the subject as soon as some new toy to play with presents itself, has stuck to the matter of the dispute over the Mahmal's medical escort with rare persistence. The newspapers turn the matter over and over, bury it, and dig it up again, like a dog reluctant to relinquish a specially toothsome bone, in which there may still lurk some undiscovered marrow. Most of the journals are still pouring out their wrath upon Hussein ibn Aly, as they invariably term the King of the Hejaz, but three or four have adopted a different tone. Clearly they have begun to smell a rat. The very virtuous original statement on the subject issued by the Egyptian Government did not, it has since transpired, tell quite the whole truth, and doubts are expressed regarding how much may still remain untold. King Hussein's well-known rapacity is held to be itself adequate reason for thinking that he would not jeopardise, for the sake of a simple pique the subsidies annually paid by the Egyptian Government. Meanwhile the Hejaz representative here has issued a statement published by King Hussein in his official newspaper, Al Kibla, purporting to be an accurate account of the negotiations with the Emir el Haj which led up to the return of the Mahmal. The Emir el Haj has retorted by giving the King the lie direct. But even this has not convinced the sceptics, for the Emir el Haj, excellent soldier that he doubtless is, is not renowned for very great tact. A further statement on the subject is promised by the Egyptian Government during the next few days, and it will make interesting reading. Certainly it will have to be a little more convincing than the last if it is to dispel the impression that there is in all this business of the Mahmal's medical escort a little more than has yet met the eye.

Signs of the Times.

With all the goodwill in the world towards the new régime in Egypt, and however optimistic one may be regarding this country's eventual ability to stand alone, it is impossible to feel much satisfaction with the manner in which Egyptians generally have been utilising their greater freedom of expression since the abolition of martial law. The tone of the Press is steadily degenerating into more and more embittered enmity towards political opponents. The Wafd has set the fashion by issuing a continuous stream of manifestoes which, after every allowance has been made for the chagrin felt by the Zaghloulist executive over its steady decline in importance, can only be described as masterpieces of unwisdom. Leaving aside the arguments used, the style of these precious documents is inflammatory and exaggerated in the extreme. Unfortunately for the Zaghloulist Party, the Wafd is now controlled almost entirely by Copts. Of the executive committee of thirteen, six are Copts, a gross disproportion compared with the thirteen to one preponderance of Moslems in the country. Already the Copts are feeling the first symptoms of the religious favouritism which will gradually squeeze Christians out of all but the lowest Government posts and the conventionally stipulated one portfolio in the Cabinet. Feeling the first cold blast of this dread wind of unpopularity, the Copts in the Wafd executive are driven to out-Herod Herod. To conserve their position in the limelight into which, under the spell of the magic name of Zaghloul, they have insinuated themselves, they are driven from one excess to another. Hence the Wafd's swift descent to unreasoning fanaticism.

Taking their cue from the Wafd, the newspapers howl in unison. Everybody who disagrees with the Zaghloulist policy is a traitor to the country, a "friend of the British," a person whose name can only be mentioned with the pendant "May God forgive him." The Zaghloulists make no secret of their intention, when they have scored the sweeping success at the polls which they anticipate, of making it impossible for any organised political opposition to exist.

Attacks on the Capitulations.

Inter-Egyptian recriminations are disappointing to friends of this country, who had hoped that it would be possible for Egyptians to sink their differences in an endeavour to pull together for the common good, but they are less disquieting than the tendency, now becoming increasingly manifest, to attempt to stir up prejudice against the foreigners resident here. Although the Zaghloulists have lost no opportunity of proclaiming abroad that they favour the continuance of the Capitula-tions in preference to British protection of foreign interests, attacks on the Capitulations are becoming increasingly frequent in the Press. The Coptic newspaper Al Misr, exhibiting the same tendency as its compatriot members of the Wafd executive, has just published a ferocious article on the subject. "The foreigners strut about the country armed from head to foot . . . the foreigner can plunge his knife into the native's chest . . . and then take refuge behind his foreign nationality, and nobody dare approach him. The police cannot effect his arrest except on the order of his Consul. And who is his Consul? His brother and compatriot; his partner in the profits. . . ." Extracting a phrase from an article is often unfair and gives a false impression, but the extract which I have made is typical of the whole of this particular outburst.

Nothing could be farther from the mind of any well-wisher of this country than to start raising a panic at this early stage of Egypt's independent life. Egypt is suffering from growing pains, like many another State that has newly won her independence. At the same time it would be folly to ignore tendencies which, if not suppressed in time, may eventually lead to much trouble.

YUGOSLAVIA.

Liubliana, August 2.

The Sinaia Conference.

A conference of foxes is the term applied by an Italian newspaper to the Little Entente Conference at Sinaia, but this designation is unfair. The communiqué issued by the Conference is so clear that it would be difficult to find an arrière-pensée. All that is needed is to examine the special desires of each member of the Little Entente in order to discover where the community of interest is complete, and where it is still being sought. And the proceedings of the Conference bear this out to the full.

Full and complete agreement was reached in regard to the Hungarian question. The unfortunate policy of revanche pursued by Hungary is the strongest bond between the members of the Little Entente, because in this matter all are equally interested and all equally endangered. Strange as it may seem, it is Hungary who deserves the most credit for the fact that the entente between Yugoslavia and Czecho-Slovakia expanded into the Little Entente by the entry of Roumania. And it is again Hungary to whom it is due that the relations between Czecho-Slovakia and Roumania, which were very lukewarm but a short time ago, have become far more cordial. How much closer these relations will yet become is as yet uncertain. Hungary's attitude will certainly continue to play a considerable part in the matter.

Meantime it is satisfactory to note that the complete agreement reached by the Conference in regard to the Hungarian question is of a nature tending to bring about an improvement in the relations between Hungary and the States of the Little Entente. The matter in question is the foreign loan which Hungary is anxious to raise, and which will scarcely succeed so long as the lien of the Little Entente upon Hungarian State property exists. The representatives of the Little Entente have agreed that this lien may be waived, in part wholly, in part under the condition that the loan will not be used for military or propagandist purposes directed against the Little Entente.

The Russian and Bulgarian questions were also discussed at length. No decisions were reached, however, and it is solely because of this, and not because of the Javorina question, that Poland finds herself as yet unable to join the Little Entente. Poland and Roumania are neighbours of a revolutionary State, and are therefore compelled to be all the time on their guard. Hence it is natural that an alliance between these two should already exist, and equally natural that neither Yugoslavia nor Czecho-Slovakia can join this alliance, because their sympathies with Russia are a matter of tradition, and there is no contentious matter between them and her save the Communistic world view. And so no decision was reached.

The Bulgarian question, too, did not get beyond the stage of discussion. At a first glance it might appear that the interests of Yugoslavia and Roumania must be identical in this question. This is not so, however. Both States have absorbed Bulgarian territory. But the Bulgars recognise only Macedonian Irredentism. The fact is that to Bulgaria the outlet on the Ægean is incomparably more important than the ports on the Black Sea, which—owing to the Straits—is not an open sea.

In connection with the Bulgarian question and that of the return of the Turks to Europe it is more than probable that the question of the entry of Greece into the Little Entente came up likewise. Yet it is not strange that this question never matured so far as even to be officially mentioned. The one link between the Little Entente and Greece is Yugoslavia. Relations between Serbia and Greece were at one time the best imaginable, but they are scarcely so good now. Greece's attitude during the world War and sundry other military experiences, no less than the constant complaints of harsh persecution which reach this country from the three hundred thousand Serbs in Greece, have between them cooled, if not entirely obliterated, the old sympathies.

Finally, the still open question of the Yugoslav zone in the harbour of Salonika is one more reason why the connecting link is at this moment not up to the strain of transmitting Greek aspirations for the formation of a Balkan alliance.

The Sinaia Conference must be described as successful, and this is borne out by the nomination of Dr. Benesh as candidate for the Little Entente in the Council of the League of Nations.

The Question of Fiume.

The Fiume question has come to a deadlock, or rather to a point of great danger. The Italian Government demands a solution of the Fiume question which would inevitably entail a revision of the Treaty of Rapallo. Now, for all Yugoslavs without distinction—whether adherents of the Great Serbian or of the Raditch Party, whether Radicals or Democrats, not to mention the Slovenes, Croats, and Dalmatians of the littoral—the Treaty of Rapallo represents the extreme limit of sacrifice. Apart from this, it must be remembered that Yugoslavia is in urgent need of a good harbour, and that to this day Fiume alone is connected by rail with the interior. Yugoslavia was content to put up with an independent Fiume; but an Italian Fiume she cannot accept.

Because of the Fiume question relations between Italy and Yugoslavia have become greatly strained. Added to this, there are other annoyances which are really and truly superfluous, such as the Italian military demonstrations on the summit of the Truglav. It must be borne in mind that this mountain was worshipped as a god by the Slovenes in the old pagan days, and is even now regarded as national holy ground with reverent affection. Why summon the clouds arising from these military demonstrations? What can Italy hope to gain by pushing forward her frontier some five yards in the mountains that she permits these demonstrations?

Finally there is the fate of the Yugoslavs in Italy. By the electoral reform just adopted in Italy the 500,000 Yugoslavs there will not be able to put up an electoral list. It is at least open to question whether it would be better for the Italian State that two or three Yugoslav deputies in the Italian Parliament should testify to the rights of this considerable national minority, or that the complete absence of any such deputies should bear witness to its complete outlawry.

Dangerous inflammable matter for the whole of Europe lies in the Adriatic question.

The Government Crisis.

Smoothly and without fuss the Radical Club dealt with the most important of its Parliamentary cares. Only one remains, the bestowal of six portfolios. Personal questions are always the most knotty questions in every party, and so it is not to be wondered at if even in the well-disciplined Radical Club they are creating a certain amount of difficulty. But M. Pashitch's authority, which is recognised throughout the club, provides the guarantee that this Government crisis—or rather party crisis—too, will find its solution, though not an altogether painless one.

The Internal Position.

The internal position is quieting down, and the espionage and treason affair, which opened so sensationally, has petered out. Not every word that is said in Yugoslavia should be taken too seriously. For the rest, all interest is at present centring round the communal elections in Serbia and Montenegro, where the final battle between Radicals and Democrats for predominance among the Serbs will be fought out. In Belgrade the prospects of the Democrats are good, but in the country the Radicals' position is better, unless the Agrarian Party may yet spoil the reckoning of both. But one had better not prophesy. August 18 will bring the decision, whatever it is.

A British Loan for Yugoslavia.

The visit of a British General to Belgrade is connected over here with negotiations for an impending loan from Great Britain. Since the Belgrade Government refused to go on with the American Blair loan, so-called, efforts have been made to secure a British loan for the construction of new railways. For Yugoslavia's future relations with Great Britain such a loan would be of importance, and therefore it is hoped that it will be realised. Not until British capital and industry take an active interest in Yugoslavia will the door be securely shut and bolted against German penetration eastwards.

It will not do to underrate the German question.

ALBANIA.

Tirana, August 1.

The True State of Albania.

The most perfect tranquillity reigns in Albania. The recent rumours of a revolt in the north, having as its object the setting of the Prince of Wied once more upon the throne, were devoid of all foundation, and emanated for reasons not altogether clear from Serbian sources, whence rumours of this kind are frequently circulated. Responsible British newspapers should refrain from publishing such reports pending verification, for they are thereby only hampering the efforts being made by British firms to develop commercial relations with Albania by raising false alarms as to the stability of the Albanian Government. Verification is an easy matter, for the Foreign Office is continuously informed of the situation over here, and, alternatively, a telegram addressed to Colonel Stirling, the British Adviser to the Albanian Ministry of the Interior, Tirana, would be promptly and authoritatively answered.

As a matter of fact, during the past year and a half, since Achmet Bey Zogu has been head of the Administration, nothing has occurred to disturb the country's tranquillity. The population has been effectively disarmed—a very remarkable achievement. Moreover, during the whole of this period hardly a case has occurred of tribal vendetta, at one time so disgracefully prevalent. Nor do the Christian populations of the centre and south any longer complain of unequal and arbitrary treatment by the favoured Mussulman classes, as occurred under the Turkish régime. Christians are everywhere rejoicing over this altered condition of affairs.

Foreign Advisers.

If progress in other directions has not been rapid, it has been at least steady. The services of three expert foreign advisers have been secured by the Government, namely, that of Colonel Stirling to the Ministry of the Interior, that of M. Hunger to the Ministry of Finance (through the help of the League of Nations), and that of Reissler Pasha, the eminent German engineer, who built the Hejaz railway, to the Ministry of Public Works. These officials are now settling down to their labours, and it will not be long before the results of their experience become apparent in the directions of administrative reform, improved financial conditions, and the development of communications. In this last respect, which reflects the most urgent need of the country, two new roads, one connecting Durazzo with Elbasán, the other connecting the northern road system based on Durazzo with the southern road system based on Valona, have already reached an advanced stage of construction.

In addition to the above, an Italian agricultural expert is in charge of the Government School of Agriculture established at Lushnia, and Dr. Haig, the medical expert of the League of Nations, is visiting the country at the present time for the purpose of presenting a report on the general conditions of health and hygiene, with the special object of securing such measures as the Government may be able to afford with the help of the League to combat the malaria scourge. Durazzo, which hitherto has been notoriously subject to malaria, has by a few simple means already become comparatively healthy.

Parliament and Concessions

Parliament is to be convened in extraordinary session on the 20th of this month to consider the Anglo-Persian Oil Company's concession, together with one in favour of an Italian company for the purpose of land reclamation in the fertile district of the Musakiya. It will also consider the question of the tobacco monopoly, after which, preliminary to dissolution, a new electoral law will be discussed.

IRAK.

Baghdad, July 25.

The Incidence of the Eed.

To-day is the first day of the Eed in Baghdad, though, according to the calendar, it ought to have been yesterday. There seems to have been some difficulty this year in deciding on which day the new moon was actually seen, with a result that many of the officials did not know until quite late on Monday night whether they would have to attend the King's levée on Tuesday morning or not. Seeing that he has had eight or nine days in which to make up his mind on which night the new moon was first seen, the kadi or other official responsible might reasonably have been expected to do better than that.

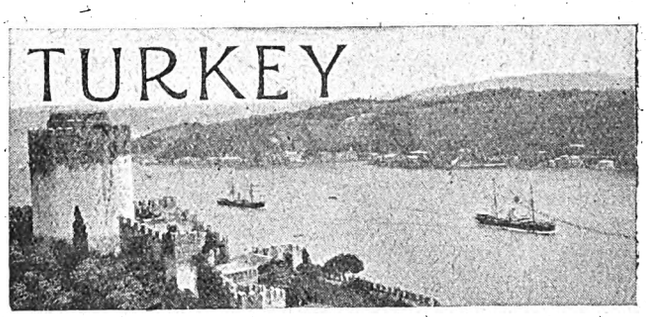
The Elections.

The elections are now the order of the day. In all liwas preparations are on foot, committees of supervision are being elected, the electoral rolls are being prepared, and it really looks as though there will be elections this time. The opposition which was so marked when the preparatory work was put in hand last year has to a large extent died down, and it is confidently hoped that a result to some extent representative of general opinion may be reached. A section of the vernacular Press is very insistently demanding certain alterations in the electoral law, and from time to time assures the public that the Government has the matter in hand and will shortly issue the instructions necessary to bring the promised changes into effect. No changes have yet been announced, however, and it seems very doubtful whether any will be made. It is recognised that the present law is only temporary to produce an Assembly which can deal with the constitutional law and formulate rules and regulations for the holding of elections for such assemblies as the constitutional law may lay down. To try to make minor alterations now would be unwise. There is other more important work lying to hand.

It is noticeable that since the departure of Sheikh Mahdi al Khalisi and the other Ulema from Kerbela and Nejef the opposition to the elections in the Kerbela liwa has passed away, and preparations for holding them are now on foot in that liwa no less than in the others.

The Death of Daoud Yusufani.

The death is announced from Mosul of Daoud Yusufani, a prominent member of the Christian community in that town. Before the War he was one of the deputies for Mosul in the Stamboul Parliament, and on the occupation of Mosul by the British force in 1918 he become Political Attaché to the Political Officer, a post which he occupied until the arrival of Sir Percy Cox in 1920, and on the institution of the Arab Government he became Minister without portfolio in the Nakeeb's first Cabinet. Irak can at the present time ill afford to lose men possessing Daoud Yusufani's ability and experience of public life.



Constantinople, August 7.

The New Assembly.

The subject which gives most food for thought in these dull days is the actions and temper of the new Assembly, which will probably meet about the middle of this month. Slight indications of what people are thinking leak through into the Press. The recent statement that the Assembly would not perpetuate the attributes of Commander-in-Chief to Ghazi Mustapha Kemal Pasha is probably inspired, and, although the lapse of his extraordinary powers is a natural consequence of the change from a state of war to that of peace, many people read in it a sign of the decadence of his personal power and status. If such is really the case, it will become in the near future a political problem of the first magnitude to find a substitute for his all-pervasive, unifying influence. There cannot yet be any question of the governance of Turkey by this, that, or the other political party; the only government that has a ghost of a chance is one that is under the control of one or two men, and it is not easy to see who are at present of sufficiently important standing or experience in any other party to inspire confidence or command a following.

Digitized by Google

Mustapha Kemal would appear to be justified if he thinks it is a case of après moi le deluge. There is no doubt, however, that a fairly strong potential opposition is hidden away in the ranks of the People's Party, and its influence may appear quite early in the Assembly's proceedings.

The Press on the Settlement.

The Press has been taking the past week or ten days to think over the various decisions taken at Lausanne and the various problems of the day. Place of honour has been accorded to the exchange of populations agreement. The Tanin has expressed the view that all open-minded observers have long held—namely, that the Moslems of Greece and the Balkans will be losing a good deal by being eradicated from their settled homesteads in comparative civilisation to be dumped in the desolate wastes of ravaged Anatolia. They are basing their hopes of comfortable installation in the financial assistance of the Turkish Government, which is reported to be going to open a credit of ten million pounds for this object; but nobody knows whence the ten millions are coming. The Circassians who were transferred from the Balkans to Anatolia before the War have had no reason to congratulate themselves upon their fate, and there are very good grounds for supposing that those Moslems who are threatened with transmigration view the prospect with alarm; also the Turkish Government itself is credited with a disposition to obstruct as much as possible the expulsion of the exchangeable Moslems from Greece. The necessity for any such exchange is a melancholy fact, and fills one with evil forebodings for the future.

The Patriarchate.

The question of the Patriarchate has not been advanced. The Turkish authorities are doubtless postponing it until the constitution of the new Government, and the attempts of the Synod to get into official touch with the authorities have failed. Meanwhile, the local Greek Press is engaged in a polemic as to the policy to be pursued, one pair of papers favouring an immediate settlement of the crisis and another counselling delay. An interesting state of affairs is disclosed by the hearing of the libel case against the Patriarch brought by the excommunicated Greeks, and Western Europeans will hardly realise the efficacy of ecclesiastical authority. One of the excommunicated bitterly complained that since his excommunication his employers discharged him and he has not been able to find another place; little boys throw stones at him, doctors avoid him, and the barber who inadvertently shaved him in ignorance of his outlawry ceremoniously washed his hands after the operation. All one can say is, good luck to the Orthodox Church; it has managed to maintain some remnants of old-time discipline.

Cabinet Responsibility.

Another matter of prime importance, to which I casually referred last week, is coming into greater prominence, viz., the modification of the law of the Constitution in the sense of creating the collective responsibility of the Cabinet. The Vatan is responsible for the statement that a commission of members of the Defence of Rights party is preparing a plan by which the President of the Assembly will be chosen by the Assembly itself; he will submit the names of two Deputies for each post in the Cabinet, and these will be submitted to the Assembly, which will choose one of them by ballot. The inconveniences of the present system are manifest, and this new proposal appears to be a reasonable half-way house between it and the system in vogue throughout Europe.

The Growth of Reason.

Refreshing frankness is shown in the discussion of the Executive's action on a variety of subjects. The troublesome passport regulations which were enforced a month or so ago, come in for some sound criticism. It is pointed out that the authorities first commit themselves to a retrograde policy of restriction of movement when other States are relaxing these hindrances to free communication. When a Great Power protests, Angora gives way, not because it has changed its principles, but because it is a Great Power which is annoyed. When the smaller Powers protest, they are told, in effect, says the Vatan, "We have adopted this principle, we do not quite know why; we cannot apply it to the Great Powers, but we think we are strong enough to apply it to you." The paper goes on to touch the spot very effectively in inquiring why Angora cannot trust its representatives abroad and in Constantinople to keep an efficient eye on undesirables, since they are in a much better position to do so than the functionaries who spend a month circulating the relative papers to a series of other functionaries as ignorant as themselves? This is plain speaking indeed; and when it goes on to deplore the effect produced upon foreigners by these bureaucratic futilities, one rubs one's eyes and asks where is the Turkey of 1922 which did not care a straw for any foreigners?

Local Details.

The local domestic events in Constantinople during the past week are of no particular significance. The Allied Forces and the Turkish Command have agreed on a system of military courtesies, such as salutes of sentries, and so on, compatible with the new relations consequent upon the signature of peace. Commissions are being formed to carry out and carry into effect the details of the coming evacuation, and various individuals and agencies are offering their services for the disposal of surplus furniture, personal effects, and so forth. There has been a gratifying reduction in the number and gravity of unpleasant incidents between the Allied Forces and the Turkish authorities and public order is being well maintained by the police.

During the week Constantinople was visited for thirty-six hours by a party of 600 American tourists, who arrived in the s.s. "Tuscania" and were effusively welcomed by the Turkish association of guides and the bazaar merchants, who have been having a very lean time. Their visit was marred by an accident which might well have been serious, but, happily, was not. A large crowd pressed into a small upper room in the Near East Relief Headquarters at Ortakeuy to inspect the bargains for sale, and the floor settled down into an inverted cone filled with struggling tourists. British ambulances were quickly on the spot; but, luckily, nothing more serious than bruises were to be treated. The party included the Goodwill delegation which has been examining social conditions, and while they were here they went over the Selimie Barracks and other refugee camps.

INDIA'S NEIGHBOURS.

At the moment it looks as if India might have to pay, perhaps rather heavily, for her persistent failure to reckon with the opinion of the world. The attitude of the bulk of Indian politicians, as exemplified, for instance, in regard to Kenya, is comprehensible, and indeed natural, but its reaction abroad is necessarily unfavourable, and foreigners imperfectly acquainted with the peculiarities of Indian mentality may be pardoned if they begin to ask whether much is to be hoped for from people who allow their feelings to blind them to so many considerations of practical importance, as well as to the patent inconsistency between their demands abroad and the social conditions prevailing in their motherland. We describe this attitude as natural, because it has its roots far back in history. Indian culture has in the past usually been characterised by a bland self-sufficiency, sometimes pathetic, at others almost ridiculous, and by a secular contempt for her neighbours, broken only by spasms of abject terror when one or other of those neighbours has been tempted to plunder her treasures and slaughter her sons in thousands. Invaders might come and go, but the mountain-walls remained, and in their shelter grew up this self-centred habit of mind, which now, after many centuries of isolation, has an opportunity of manifesting itself abroad, and which is doing more than anything else to tarnish the reputation of India in the eyes of the world at large. The beginnings of a change may indeed be detected here and there among Indians who have visited distant lands, but it spreads very slowly, and well-wishers of the country are tempted to search for possibilities of such foreign intercourse as might bring new influences to bear on Indians in the mass, and thus accelerate a movement which is becoming seriously overdue.

From this point of view, however, it must be admitted that a glance along the land frontier of India is not encouraging. On the extreme flanks natural conditions render practically impossible any extensive intercourse, whether cultural or commercial, with Persia on the West, or with Siam and Indo-China on the East. The centre is perhaps slightly more hopeful, for there have of late been signs of a certain weakening in the long-standing isolation characteristic of Tibet and Nepal. We hear of increased desires in these regions to enjoy some of the conveniences of modern civilisation, and also to maintain more friendly relations with the Indian Government, and this is all to the good, but the movement is slow, and at the best its effects could only be small. The inquirer is thus reduced to the possibilities of two very different regions—of China on the North-East and Afghanistan on the North-West. If the world had been organised as a sociological laboratory, one of the earliest investigations carried out would have been directed to a study of the interaction of Indian and Chinese culture in the mass, and we are justified in hoping that the process will eventually take place, but the time for it has not yet come. China is changing, but even her best friends will admit that she has not yet produced an effective organ for enforcing, or even expressing, the national will, and until it has been expressed caution must still be the watch-word on a frontier which has been the scene of conflict in the past. The will of the new China may prove to be the will to war, and, so long as any uncertainty exists, it is impossible to press for the opening up of new channels by which interaction on the large scale could freely take place. On the side of Afghanistan, too, we are confronted with problems rather than solutions. The present ruler of the country is undoubtedly one of the most interesting of the minor figures now on the world's stage. His judgment is not infallible, as has been shown by events too recent to require recapitulation, but he has done much in a very short time in pursuance of his object to make his country an important factor in the politics of Asia. At the moment, indeed, there are suggestions that he may have done too much, and that the reactionary forces, which certainly exist, may become dangerously prominent; but the new inspiration is likely to be durable, though its strength may fluctuate, and the permanent interests of both countries would be furthered by a large development of frank and friendly intercourse. It will be a definite gain for the world when Afghans shall have ceased to regard Indians as people only worth looting, and when Indians shall be able to look on Afghans as something more than murderous marauders; but such changes in national sentiment cannot be effected in a moment, and the most that can be hoped for is the gradual development of a sentiment of mutual respect, leading in time to a more cordial relationship.

Men of a seafaring race are tempted to suppose that a country with such neighbours on its land frontiers will seek and find its friends mainly across the water, and India occupies a position naturally favourable for extended intercourse with the East as well as with the West. Indians could indeed derive almost incalculable benefit from accurate knowledge of other parts of Asia, whether of the partial synthesis already effected in Japan, of the remarkable achievements of the French in Indo-China, or of the busy island-empire of the Dutch; but in each case difficulties of language reinforce the social and religious obstacles in the way of sea-travel, which, though they are gradually giving way, are still factors to be taken into serious account. By sea, then, as by land, the conditions which exist afford little encouragement for the hope that India can benefit in the near future, as other countries have benefited in the past, by rubbing shoulders freely with men of other races. All the greater is the obligation which rests on the privileged few to turn their opportunities of travel to the best account, and to share with their home-staying countrymen the benefits they have enjoyed. Three centuries ago a proverbial saying was popular in Europe to describe travellers who failed to show that they had profited by distant journeys; such men were compared to the mainmast, "which has also been to India," and the gibe is unfortunately not wholly inapplicable to some of the Indians who have returned to their homes, showing no signs that they have ever been abroad. India stands in urgent need of enlightened criticism of her institutions, her habits, and her methods of work. Like most other nations, she is apt to resent the criticisms of foreigners, however well-intentioned they may be, and the very fact that competent Indian critics are necessarily few in number increases the obligation which rests on those few to throw their acquired knowledge into the common national stock.

AN EARLY TRAVELLER IN THE SUDAN AND ABYSSINIA.

By "ABU NAKHLA."

The first two instalments of this article, which is here concluded, were contained in the issues of THE NEAR EAST for June 7 and August 9.—ED.

An interesting account of the feudal system of Abyssinia as developed and used by the Emperor Menelik was published in the Quarterly Review of January, 1922, and it is interesting to compare it with that found by Poncet. It is clear that Menelik used the materials to his hand, though he greatly extended and tightened up a system which had been in force for centuries. In the time of Poncet both Tigre and Gojjam were subject to the Crown of Gondar, and "Agau" is mentioned as a recent acquisition to the Empire. War against the Galla and Shangalla was an annual affair, and we know that they were not finally subdued until the time of Menelik. These tribes seem to have been able to put up a fairly stubborn defence, aided by the inaccessible nature of their country and the use of poisoned arrows. Of the feudal system Poncet says:—

The great Power of the Emperour arises from hence, that he is absolute Master of all the Wealth of his Subjects. He gives, and he takes away as he thinks fit. When the Head of a Family happens to die, he seizes upon all his Real Estate, of which he leaves two Thirds to the Children as Heirs. He disposes of the other Third to some Favourite, who by that Means becomes his Feudatary, and is obliged to serve him in time of War at his own Expences, and to furnish him with Soldiers in proportion to the Estate he gives. . . .

Poncet visited Lake Tsana, which he calls Bahal Dembea, but was prevented by illness from visiting the source of the Blue Nile, of which he gives only a hearsay account. With the Lake he was delighted, and spent three days there with the Emperor in one of his island palaces, to which the party crossed in boats made of reeds. Poncet saw here his first hippopotamus, and draws as freely as usual on his own imagination and on the credulity of his readers in describing them:—

. . . . Notice was given to the Emperour that four River-Horses appear'd upon the Lake. We had the Diversion to behold them for half an Hour. They drove the Water before them, and darted themselves up very high. The Skin of two of those Animals was white, and of the two others red. Their Heads resembled that of a Horse, but their Ears were shorter. I could not frame a Judgment of the rest of their Bodies, having only seen them confusedly. Those River-Horses are amphibious Creatures which come out of the River to feed upon the Grass of the Banks, from whence they often carry away Goats and Sheep, which they eat. Their Skin is much esteem'd; they make Bucklers of them, which are Proof against a Musket or Lance. The Æthiopians eat the Flesh of these Animals, which must needs be unwholesome Food. The Manner of taking them is this. As soon as they discover one they follow him with Sword in Hand, and cut his Legs; not being able any longer to swim, he comes to the River Side, where he bleeds to death. The Emperour commanded a Cannon to be shot against these River-Horses, but not being nimble enough in shooting the Animals div'd into the Water and disappear'd.

The introduction of firearms into Abyssinia has doubtless altered the methods of hunting, but Sir Samuel Baker found the Hamran Arabs on the upper reaches of the Atbara and on the Setit rivers hunting elephant, lion, and hippopotamus in a manner very much the same as that described by Poncet.

In due course Poncet craved and obtained from the Emperor a reluctant consent to his departure, and on May 2, 1700, started on his journey to the coast at Massawa, which he reached without misadventure. He records that on the way he visited a monastery which contained a miracle in the shape of a rod of gold that remained always suspended in the air above the altar of the church, although not supported by any natural agency. This he vouches for, and adds that he verified it by passing his cane on all sides of the golden rod. There is nothing new under the sun, and even Mr. Maskelyne was not, apparently, the first in the field.

Massawa, then in the hands of the Turks, was a place of little military strength, "and a single Man of War well mann'd would easily make it self Master of it." Indeed, the appearance in the roads during Poncet's visit of a British war vessel threw the whole place into a panic, until the commander sent assurances ashore that he had no hostile intentions. Moreover, the Turks were perforce careful to maintain good relations with the Abyssinians, on whom they depended for all supplies, and on whose suffrance, therefore, they continued to hold the place. They were glad enough to extend a cordial reception to Poncet, who held a recommendation from the Emperor at Gondar.

The Pasha at Massawa had a subordinate officer in charge of the port at Suakin, where the trade in pearls and oyster shells was in a prosperous condition.

The Emperor had determined to send an ambassador to accompany Poncet to the Court of France, but this functionary was delayed by the ceremonies attending the death of Basil, the Emperor's son, and Poncet left Massawa without him on the first sea-worthy vessel that offered; it was not until his stay at the monastery of Sinai that the Abyssinian ambassador finally joined him. Even the modern sambuk or dhow of the Red Sea hardly affords ideal accommodation for a European, and we may sympathise with Poncet in his refusal to trust himself to anything so frail as the country craft of two centuries ago, with their leaky hulls and sails of matting:—

I had no mind to hazzard my self in the ships of the Country, which appear'd to be very slight and unsafe, the Planks altho' pitch'd and tarr'd, being only fasten'd together with pitiful cords, as well as the Sails, which are only made of Mats of the Leaves of Dome. Notwithstanding, these Vessels, altho' so ill rigg'd out, and worse govern'd, carry a great Weight, and altho' they have not above seven or eight Men to manage them, they are of great Use in all that Sea.

Navigation through the reefs of the coast was by day only, and Jedda was not reached until December 5, 1700, after a voyage of thirty-seven days. The Turkish hold on the Hejaz was then passing through one of its more precarious phases.

Two Days after my Arrival at Gedda, the King of Mecca came thither with an Army of Twenty thousand Men. He pitch'd his Tents, and encamp'd at the Gate of the Town which leads to Mecca. I had a sight of him; he is a Man of about Sixty Years of Age, of a Majestick Presence, and somewhat of a ghastly Look. He has a slit in the under Lip upon the right Side. His Subjects and Neighbours do not much commend his Sweetness and Clemency. He oblig'd the Bacha, who resides at Gedda for the Grand Signior, to give him Fifteen thousand Crowns of Gold, and threaten'd him with Military Execution, if he did not forthwith obey.

This sum, with another of twice the same amount, which he extracted from the merchants, the Shereef distributed amongst his troops. The claim of the Khalif at Constantinople to appoint the Shereef of Mecca was then in abeyance, and wholesale pillaging of caravans was rife. From Jedda Poncet took ship to Yambio and Tor, now the International Quarantine Station for the Egyptian Pilgrimage. From Tor he made a journey inland to the monastery at Mount Sinai, and was there joined after a stay of a month by the dilatory ambassador from Gondar. He again embarked at Tor, and, in due course, reached Suez and Cairo, where we may leave him recounting his adventures of the past three years to Monsieur Maillet, the French Consul, and planning to return to France and give an account of his mission to the Court.

If he had a rather excessive aptitude for "adorning a tale," we must give him credit for great pluck and endurance, and thank him for a vivid and quite reasonably accurate picture of the North-East Africa of his day.

NEAR EAST BOOKSHELF.

THE HUNTER OF WISDOM.

"THE BRAHMIN'S TREASURE." By C. E. Bechhofer. (London: Mills and Boon. 7s. 6d. net.)

We have heard in novels enough, and far more than enough, of the glamour of the East; but we have not had, until we read this book by Mr. Bechhofer, put before us with such strength and certainty the appeal of India's spirit and peace. The author makes out that his central figure, an Englishman called Hewitt, can attain quiet of spirit (and implied quiet of body) only in India; and though we are not convinced of the permanency of Hewitt's belief, the story of his development is interestingly done.

The novel begins with Hewitt in India, tired of yet indulging in the futile wastefulnesses of the white man's life there, and eventually succumbing to the temptation of "going native." He comes strongly under the influence (one suspects that all through his life he will be far too easily influenceable) of a Brahmin philosopher; and one knows that while this influence is working on him his love affairs (not really, but ostensibly such) will count for little. But on being recalled to England he is forced once more to recognise the material side of life. Bad luck follows him; he resorts, through weakness, rather than strength, to desperate measures, and, for a man of his moral command and philosophic inclination, falls pretty low.

It is at this point that Mr. Bechhofer becomes rather a propagandist, a reporter, than a novelist, for he introduces, with no disguise at all, famous persons in an important movement of to-day. Everyone will recognise his portraits—for they are faithfully drawn—of the Editor of the best weekly (until recently), the novelist in Eastern tales, and so on. Into this group Hewitt is drawn; from the Editor he seizes the value of the "Mahabharata," and from the leader of the Editor's philosophic sect, Kharaif, he learns a little how to see the wisdom of the East in terms of modern life. But in the West he cannot properly apprehend or translate his new values; he returns, having attained a certain minimum of prosperity, to India, to seek at his ease and unhampered by humans, the sageness and knowledge of the Brahmin. There the book ends.

It is all very readable and interesting. Mr. Bechhofer has, of course, excellent descriptive gifts and a certain restraint in language that are useful indeed for his present purpose. But one doubts whether his Hewitt really digested the new (or very old) doctrines; one doubts his stability; one doubts his self-reliance. In his character there are far too many digressions, diversions which have little part with the whole of his character, marring even an approximate synthesis. Similarly with the book, which is, one imagines, founded far too closely on actual (and sometimes real) experience to merit the name of novel; though it begins firmly and ends with precise lack of finality, it wobbles and wanders into inconsequent and insignificant places in the middle. Mr. Bechhofer has seen Hewitt's life whole enough, but he has not envisaged it steadily.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE AND THE SUBALTERN.

"FORTY YEARS A SOLDIER." A Volume of Recollections by Major-General Sir George Younghusband, K.C.M.G., K.C.I.E. (London: Herbert Jenkins, Ltd, 16s. net.)

Sir George Younghusband has a story worth telling and the gift of being able to tell it fluently and clearly. During his forty years of soldiering (forty years all but ten days, he tells us, ending on November 11, 1918), he fought on the Indian Frontier, in the Sudan, in Burmah, through the Boer War, and in Mesopotamia in the Great War. All that he has to tell us of the Corps of Guides, which he joined soon after the beginning of his service, and which he commanded for five years, is a welcome addition to our knowledge of a Corps whose name stands for the romance of danger and magnificent courage. He writes with enthusiasm of his memories of the adventures and perils which he shared in Afghanistan as a subaltern. The chapters on the Boer War are interesting and give a vivid impression of the character of the fighting. Of the "Mesopotamian Tragedy," it is easy to see that he forces himself to write with difficulty and pain. Most of Sir George Younghusband's stories are decidedly entertaining. This is particularly the case in those which show his own quickness and resource, as when he tells us how, at the time of the Fashoda trouble, he contrived to see the forts of Saigon from a French ship. But, although a book of autobiographical memoirs must necessarily contain a great deal about the author, this one strikes us chiefly as being written in praise of Sir George Younghusband's comrades on his many campaigns and adventures. He writes proudly of their friendship and comradeship—both of those who fell, some so soon after they and he had left Sandhurst, and of those to whom a footnote refers with a title and a string of letters after their names. If it should be possible that anyone, so soon after the Great War, should need to be reminded of the greatness of the British subaltern he would find the reminder here. "He is a priceless and peerless person, the finest knight the world has ever seen." He "is the root and kernel of the whole matter." And, indeed, the whole book, not omitting the chapters on polo and on hawking, might be said to be written in his honour. It seems to us that a book like this, written with such sincerity, should stand well the test of time as a record of those who with an unquestioning belief in the greatness of the British Empire, light hearts, and great courage devoted their lives to the service of their country through the extraordinary rapidity of the changes brought about during this period of forty years.

A FUTURE FOR CONSTANTINOPLE.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—With the Lausanne Treaty out of the way and Constantinople about to be freed from the Army of Occupation, the Turks can devote themselves entirely to their domestic affairs, and proceed with the difficult task of putting their house in order. But what interests them and the Moslem world more, perhaps, than anything else is the guardianship of the Holy Places of Islam, which offers a problem by no means simple, and one which we ourselves have created by our supporting King Hussein's pretensions to independence in the Hejaz.

The recent incident in connection with the "Kisweh," or Holy Carpet as we call it, gives some idea of the troubles which are likely to arise in the future with a ruler at Mecca independent of the Khalifa—a ruler who can, as it were, dictate to the rest of the Mohammedan world the form of pilgrimage which, in the future, will be acceptable in the Holy City.

Whether the Ka-aba should be venerated by the annual presentation of a Kisweh fabricated in Cairo at great cost appears, at first sight, a matter which concerns only the Egyptians, especially as it seems to have been a task self-imposed by a former ruler in Egypt. Nevertheless, to judge from the haste with which King Hussein provided another Kisweh for the Ka-aba, the ceremony appears to be prescribed by the Mohammedan religion; should, therefore, the Egyptian Government in the future cease to show its veneration by refusing to send the Kisweh, unless accompanied by a Medical Mission of a certain strength, will it be regarded as an affront to the Mohammedan religion or merely as a snub for King Hussein? Further, what effect will such refusal have with the people of Egypt who annually speed the departure of the Kisweh with much pomp and ceremony? Again, were the Egyptian Government to appeal to the Khalifa and obtain a ruling in its favour—will King Hussein obey that ruling? If not, who is going to enforce the same, and shall we interfere to prevent our protégé, King Hussein, from attack by either Egypt or Turkey? This last question must be answered in the negative; yet without our backing the Kingdom of the Hejaz will not last long. Troubles are certainly sur le tapis in more senses than one, and those who contend that the guardianship of the Holy Places of Islam must rest with the Khalifate or some authority delegated by the Khalifa know what they are talking about.

Of course, it is quite on the cards that King Hussein resuscitates the Arab Khalifate, and proclaims himself Khalifa, but how long would he last without our assistance? And is the rest of the Mohammedan world, with the exception, perhaps, of Irak, likely to accept such a solution? Were the existing Khalifa still the Sultan of the Turkish Empire with all his former power, there can be no doubt what the answer would be; but we have yet to learn that the Moslems in general are prepared to accept a Khalifa shorn of all Temporal power and merely a puppet graciously permitted by the Angora Assembly to retain the title. It remains to be seen, also, whether the Turks themselves regard the present Sultan as nothing more than a locum tenens pending some more definite arrangement. It is quite possible that Mustapha Kemal Pasha intends to deal with the Khalifate question when the Turkish Constitution has been reconstructed more in keeping with the age, the old form of government with its "Church and State" not being to his liking.

The present writer is not in the confidence of the Turkish authorities, and has no information other than reports in the Press to assist him in forming the conclusions which he has reached. Nevertheless, he has in his own mind little doubt that the reform of the secular Constitution first, and of the religious Constitution later, is the policy which is actuating Mustapha Kemal and those with him, and, in his opinion, it is a very sound policy to follow. Further, the writer is prepared to make a shrewd guess regarding the manner in which this policy is likely to develop in the future.

The better to appreciate this forecast, it will be as well to bear in mind that a Sultan of Turkey has in the past enjoyed also the privileges of the Khalifa, not by virtue of any descent from the Prophet, but solely by the right of conquest. And if this right has never been seriously challenged during the last five hundred years, it is owing to the fact that there has been no Moslem ruler of sufficient power to dispute the claim. But although the spiritual power of the former Sultans has never been dangerously questioned, their temporal power has, as we all know, been continuously encroached on by their European neighbours. The War and the events following the War have, however, entirely changed the whole outlook. In the first place, Turkey has no longer any Arab dependencies, there being kings in Irak and the Hejaz, to say nothing of Arab States in the making in Palestine and in the trans-Jordan area. Egypt and Afghanistan also now enjoy complete independence, and the Moslems of India have been granted a political status which formerly they did not possess. The Khalifate question has, therefore, assumed an entirely new aspect, and the Turkish Government probably now recognises that a Khalifa can no longer govern without discretion, and must be one accepted by the other Mohammedan Powers. Otherwise he will not be tolerated for any length of time, though it may for the moment be regarded as treason to say so.

This is one side of the picture. On the other side we see a Turkish Government with its prestige greatly enhanced, thanks to Mustapha Kemal's victories over the Greeks and Ismet Pasha's diplomatic successes at Lausanne. We may take it, therefore, that, as regards any questions which may arise with Europe, these budding States will all be solidly behind the Turkish Government, and will look to Angora for guidance. Altogether it may be said that, though dismembered, the Turkish Empire has in reality lost nothing, and the Moslem cause in general has gained considerably. In short, it rests with the Turkish reformers to make good their victories. First, by not dissipating all that they have gained by bad government; and secondly, by conciliating the Arabs and Egyptians, till, Phœnix-like, "a United States of Islam" arises from the ashes of the former Turkish Empire. Are there Turkish statesmen capable of doing this?

Let us presume, at all events, that Mustapha Kemal Pasha and his lieutenants succeed in establishing a fairly representative Assembly at Angora, and (as many of us hope) that they will remain there. The assembly of a religious conference at Constantinople should be their next step, and to this conference all the neighbouring Mohammedan States should be invited to send delegates, the object of this conference being to frame a religious Constitution or Khalifate Council, to include sheiks and ulemas from all the Moslem States formerly incorporated in the Turkish Empire. It will, so it is hoped, be left to this Council to elect a Khalifa much in the same way as cardinals in Rome elect a Pope. The number of representatives from each State would be by agreement, the Turkish vote possibly predominating.

It is contended that the election of a Khalifa by a Council thus constituted would be in keeping with modern requirements, and will not conflict in any way with the democracy taught by the Prophet at Mecca. Moreover, seeing that the Turks have accepted the democratic principle in their secular Constitution, they cannot with reason refuse to do so in religious matters—with this difference: the secular Government, the State, will be the limit, whereas in religious matters the brotherhood of Islam recognises no boundaries.

It may be regarded as an impertinence for a non-Moslem even to suggest such a form of election; but when it is recognised that the writer has no interest whatsoever in the religious side of the question, and that the suggestion is merely put forward as the best means of attaining a political end, viz., the federation of certain Moslem States with the seat of the Federal Government at Constantinople, may his presumption be forgiven?

Anyhow, the writer is convinced that once a Khalifa's Council is established at Constantinople the advantages of economic unity will be discussed and a Zallverein will soon follow—are we not also taught that economic unity is the first step towards political unity? On the other hand, without such unity in religious government, before long there will certainly be an Arab Khalifa in the field, and a struggle for the Holy Places of Islam could then hardly be avoided. But it goes without saying that a Khalifa elected as indicated would be recognised as the ex-officio guardian of the Holy Cities, and his ruling accepted as final even if the King of the Hejaz was locally the Khalifa's representative.

Once Constantinople is accepted as the seat of the religious Government, the El Azzar University at Cairo would play a less prominent part in Moslem theology, even supposing that the larger number of students did not migrate to Constantinople. There would appear to be no reason either why in secular matters Constantinople should not become an educational centre, to which Mohammedan youths would flock to complete their studies instead of to the capitals of Europe, where, without becoming good Christians, many learn to be bad Mohammedans, failing to withstand the many temptations which surround them. Constantinople might even yet be selected as the seat of the League of Nations, and instead of being the storm centre of the world become the City of Peace.—

BRITISH GRAVES IN TURKEY.

By the terms of the Lausanne Treaty the Turkish Government are bound, within six months of being notified by each of the Allied Governments of their requirements, to concede in perpetuity the full and entire use of the land forming the sites of Allied cemeteries and other commemorative monuments. The area known as the Anzac area, about 2¼ square miles in extent, will be treated as one vast cemetery, in which the remains of many of those who have never been found will lie where they fell, near their comrades who are buried in the cemeteries close by.

Although the Turkish Government are bound to respect and maintain all Allied graves in their territory, the Treaty provides that all necessary facilities shall be given to national civil organisations—the Imperial War Graves Commission for the British Empire—who are entrusted with the construction and maintenance of the cemeteries. These national organisations alone have the right of concentrating their dead should concentration be necessary. Inasmuch as the construction of the British war cemeteries on the Peninsula is now nearly complete, no further removals are contemplated by the Imperial War Graves Commission. To enable the Turkish Government to have an accurate survey of the lands to be ceded, a kind of Boundary Commission will be appointed by each of the Allied Governments, on which the Turkish Government will nominate a representative. The duties of these Commissions will be to verify on the spot the existing sites, and forward the final plans to the Turkish Government to enable them to grant the formal concession in perpetuity. The determination of future sites that may be rendered necessary by the possibility of further concentration by any of the Allies will be made by the various Boundary Commissions in agreement with the Turkish representative. No rent, tax, or other imposition will be placed on the lands ceded, and access will be free at all times to the representatives of the Allied Governments and visitors to the graves.

The Cairo correspondent of The Times says that the first stage in the general election—namely, the election of secondary electors—which had been fixed for August 22, has been postponed for a month, as it has been found that many lists of voters have been incorrectly drawn up owing to the inexperience of the committees appointed for the purpose.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London,
Tuesday Morning.

British Reparations Policy.

The British Note to France and Belgium on Reparations and the Ruhr—a document which will rank with the most important of those that have seen the light since 1914, and the consequences of which may be of the most momentous character—shows the serious nature of the differences between the policy of this country and that of its Allies. France and Belgium have believed that by concentrating on the Ruhr policy they will attain the end desired by all the Allies. I use the past tense advisedly, for it is no longer certain that the force of circumstances has not altered the aim. This country, on the other hand, has all along been convinced that the goal is not to be attained by these means, and the present position is surely the clearest justification of this view. It is pointed out in the Note that the occupation of the Ruhr "has produced, at great cost, less receipts for the Allies, notably of coal and coke, than were forthcoming in the previous year"; and, further, that the Government "feel that the resulting situation involves great and growing danger to the peaceful trade of the world," and regards its continuance "as fraught with the gravest risks, both economic and political." In view of the known facts, it cannot be said that that is any too serious a survey of the position.

The Present Position.

One has only to look at some of the effects up to the present to realise how absolutely essential it is that a solution should be found for the impasse, and a speedy one at that. Until recently it cannot be said that this country has been directly affected by the Continental position; but we have now begun to feel the effects, and instead of being able to look forward to a development of the trade revival, we are faced with the unenviable possibility that the coming winter may witness a very marked increase of unemployment. The mark is the best evidence of the effect on Germany of the situation. In a few short weeks it has gone from a figure at which its recovery was possible to a quotation at which it no longer counts. Unfortunately, economic developments of this character are only too liable to have effects beyond their immediate environment, which only goes to show how vital it is to arrive at a settlement. A Germany reduced to poverty will help no one, will certainly not provide the wherewithal for Reparations, and will, on the contrary, be a positive menace to the economic welfare of the world.

The Egyptian Government and Cotton.

The Egyptian Government's decision to intervene in the cotton market, reference to which by our Cairo Correspondent will be found on another page, is rather surprising, and in present conditions must be regarded as a somewhat venturesome move, if, as it is reported, it is intended to purchase cotton on a large scale. Attempts have been made to persuade the Government to intervene on several occasions recently, but without success, and it would appear that this change of policy is due to the big cotton growers. Of course, there is no getting away from the fact that the low price of cotton has been a grave disadvantage, but it is open to doubt whether Government intervention is justified. At the very best it can only be a remedial measure of a temporary character. The price of cotton depends on the operation of the law of supply and demand, and on no other factor, and it is difficult to see how the withholding from the market for the time being of a considerable amount of cotton can ease the position. Ultimately, the cotton must be "unloaded," and the mere fact that that operation has to take place is bound to have a decided influence on prices.

Gemsah Oil Reefs.

In view of the moderate success that has so far attended the search for oil in Egypt, special interest attaches to the announcement by the Gemsah Oil Reefs, which will be found elsewhere, that the company has struck oil at a depth of 1,435 ft., and that the oil has a specific gravity of 0.845. In view of the high specific gravity, the company cabled to its field manager for confirmation, and the figures have duly been confirmed. Further news from the company will be awaited with considerable interest.

The Egyptian Cultivator.

An important step has recently been taken by the Egyptian Government in the interests of poor cultivators. The Government has arranged with the National Bank of Egypt for the grant to them of financial assistance at the commencement of the cotton season. It is then that the cultivator feels the need of money most keenly, and it often means selling his crop at very low prices. Under the arrangement between the Government and the bank the cultivator will be in a position to derive full benefit from his crop.

MARKETS RATHER DULL.

An Unsettled Tendency.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

The markets have naturally not been unaffected by the developments in the political situation, and while the tone at the commencement yesterday was fairly steady, the appreciation of the differences between this country and its Allies led to a distinctly unsettled tendency. Prices, however, have not been greatly affected, and the fact that gilt-edged have made quite a firm showing adds point to my comment some time ago that adverse political developments no longer affect the markets to the extent that they did. A contributory cause of the relative firmness that has been in evidence is the belief that, despite the present divergence of the aims of the Allies, a way to agreement will be found which will enable a settlement of the confused Continental position. One can only hope that this will prove to be the case, for it would be futile not to recognise the fact that conditions in Germany are rapidly deteriorating, and when a currency depreciates, as the German mark has done, other unpleasant developments are distinctly possible.

Coming Loans.

Despite the prevailing conditions, there are a whole host of foreign loans on the tapis, and the fact that all and sundry turn to this country for accommodation demonstrates very plainly that whatever was the case when the war ended, London has fully regained its position as the premier financial mart. Possible loans include not a few for Near Eastern countries. The major part of the Greek loan authorised by the League of Nations is, it is understood, to be issued here, while there is, apparently, a possibility of a Turkish loan in the near future.

Gilt-edged Steady.

Gilt-edged have generally been steady. Consols are 58½, War Loan Fives are 101 7-16, the Conversion Loan is 79¾, while Fundings are 93⅛. Indian stocks have been fairly firm. The Seven per Cent. Loan is 120¾, the 5½ per Cent. Loan is 101¼, while the Three per Cent. Loan is 60.

The market in Foreign Government securities has been very dull on the political situation. French stocks are considerably lower. War Loan Fives are 25, while the Four per Cents. are 19¾. Italian Rentes are down to 18, while German Three per Cents. are 13s. Czecho-Slovak Eight per Cents. have been fairly steady, closing at 94. In Near Eastern securities Turkish Unified are lower at 18¾, while Greeks have developed weakness.

Industrials Dull.

A very dull tone has ruled in the Industrial group, and some irregularity of prices has developed, though, generally speaking, price movements have been very small, business having been on a most restricted scale.

Textiles have displayed a rather uncertain tendency. Coats are 68s. 6d., while Courtaulds are 61s. 9d. Tobaccos have been easy, with Bats at 101s. 3d., and Imperial Tobaccos at 69s. 9d. Iron and Steel shares have made a fairly firm showing. Armstrongs are 16s. 6d., Guest Keens are 40s. 6d., and Vickers are 12s. 9d.

There has not been much doing in Shipping securities. P. and O. Deferred are 307, Cunards are 18s. 9d., Furness Withys are 28s. x.d., while Khedivial Mails are 1⅜. Bank shares have been firm. Chartered of India are 19¾, National of India are 44¾, P. and O. Banks are 12⅜, while Imperial of Persias are 7.

Oils Lower.

During the past week Oil shares improved, but the developments in the political situation effectually put an end to the rise, and yesterday the market closed on a distinctly weak note.

Burmahs are 4½, Anglo-Persian Ord. are 3¼, Mexican Eagles are 20s. 1½d., Shell Transport are 3 9-32, while Lobitos are 5⅝. In the Egyptian group, Gemsah Oil Reefs have been very strong on the favourable announcement, which will be found elsewhere, and closed at 1, after being rather higher. Anglo-Egyptian B. are 1¼. In the Roumanian group, Phœnix are 31-32, Dacia Romanos are 25-32, Steaua Romanas are 8s., while Hamilton's Concessions are 1s. 6d.

Egyptians Firm.

Egyptian securities have been fairly firm. Aboukirs are 17s. 6d., Beheras are 7¼, Egyptian Markets are 22s. 3d., Egyptian Salt and Soda are 23s. 6d., Gharbieh Lands are 1⅝, Kassala Cotton are 13s., New Egyptians are 21s. 6d., Sidi Salems are 18s. 3d., and Union Foncieres are 1 15-16.

Rubbers Improving.

The rise in the price of the raw commodity has helped the Rubber market, and the shares have begun to display a much healthier appearance. The declaration of modest dividends by companies has also helped matters, suggesting, as it does, the revival of prosperity at no distant period. Certainly it may now be taken for granted that the industry has definitely turned the corner.

THE AGRICULTURAL SITUATION IN INDIA.

The India Office has issued the following report on the agricultural situation in India to the end of July:—

The monsoon was late everywhere except in Bengal. Rainfall, though irregularly distributed, was adequate, except in West Madras, Western Bengal, a portion of the United Provinces, Rajputana and Baluchistan. There is a dry zone in Upper Burma. In this tract, protracted drought since the latter half of June has afforded anxiety for cotton and sesamum. Some damage to crops has been caused by heavy rains and floods in parts of Madras, Bengal, Assam, and agricultural operations have been retarded in Central India. The area under jute in Bengal has increased by about 30 per cent., owing to the high prices obtained last year. The condition of standing crops is generally good, except in parts of the Circars in Madras and in the United Provinces. The supply of food grain is sufficient and prices are generally easy. Employment is available and the condition of the people is satisfactory. Cattle are doing well and the fodder supply is sufficient, except in Bombay, Hyderabad and parts of Rajputana. The agricultural situation is generally good. More rain is, however, needed in the majority of Provinces.

British Consular Reports.

VI.—YUGOSLAVIA.

(Concluded)

ZAGREB DISTRICT.

The following extracts are taken from the report for the district of Zagreb for 1922 of Mr. G. T. Maclean, H.M. Consul at Zagreb :—

Although in some quarters there exists a tendency to take a pessimistic view of the situation, it is probably true that fair progress was made during the period under review towards the revival of stable and satisfactory economic and commercial conditions in Yugoslavia. This district, however, like the rest of the country, is still suffering from a variety of ills, chief among which may be mentioned (a) Exchange troubles; (b) Disorganisation in railway transport; (c) Lack of trained civil servants of all ranks.

The congestion in the goods traffic still acts as a serious barrier to the revival of trade. Whatever be the reasons the fact remains that wagons loaded with merchandise remain for months held up on both sides of Zagreb owing to congestion of the sidings.

In a country where the vast majority of the population are engaged in agriculture, it is unavoidable that the bulk of the requirements in manufactured goods must be imported. A certain progress has been shown in local industry, but there is still much to be done before the country can be said to be on the way to combat the adverse trade balance. Practically half the total imports into Yugoslavia are represented by textile goods, the only local textile factories of any importance in the area under discussion being the cotton mills at Dugaresa and Trzic.

The difficulties with exchange, etc., are particularly to be regretted at the present moment, as owing to the increasing cost of production in Czecho-Slovakia and other neighbouring States, Great Britain is at last reaching a stage where competition in this market is possible. British goods, especially textiles, can now undercut Czech goods in this country, and I was recently informed that Italian cotton goods were quoted 10 per cent. higher, without counting cost of transport, than similar British goods delivered in Zagreb.

Given an improvement in the conditions described, and allowing for adequate exploitation of natural resources and exportation, so that importation could increase without undue danger to the trade balance, this country should prove of considerable interest to British exporters.

SKOPLJE DISTRICT.

The following extracts are taken from the report for the district of Skoplje by Mr. Bird, H.M. Vice-Consul there :—

Undoubted progress has been made in all branches of economic life during the current year. As regards commerce, there is a marked change from the old system of dependence on Salonika. A considerable number of firms are now in direct touch with the United Kingdom and the United States. There is also a tendency to specialise in definite branches; formerly merchants were inclined to dabble in countless branches of commercial activity, with the result that one could buy chocolate, boots and cotton in the same shop either wholesale or retail. There is also a greater tendency towards fixed prices due to the influence of merchants from Old Serbia. The local merchant has probably more commercial and financial sense than the Serbian merchant, though he is deficient in technical training. Local merchants still base their prices on the rate of sterling on the day of sale. With a rising exchange this has the effect of increasing considerably the cost of living, but merchants are hereby enabled to cover themselves, pay their debts and replenish their stocks in spite of the high rate of exchange. Under this system prices vary not only from day to day but from the morning to the afternoon.

Commerce has been hampered by the financial policy of the Government. . . . It is hoped that the greater freedom from restriction allowed by the present Government will have a good effect both on the rate of exchange and on trade generally. In the second place, commerce is hindered by the high cost and by the inefficiency of railway transport. Railways are badly needed in the interior. The state of the roads is bad and the cost of transport by road is excessive. The cost of transporting an oka of rice from Stip to Veles, a distance of little more than twenty miles, is two and a half dinars. It thus pays the merchant better to import rice from America; as a result, the production of rice in the Kocana district has fallen from 6,000,000 to 2,500,000 okas per annum.

High export duties have also been instrumental in losing trade. Live stock is a good case in point. The Government fixed the export duty on live stock at 100 dinars for animals under one hundred kilos in weight and at two hundred and fifty dinars for animals over one hundred kilos. The result was that the exporters to Malta underfed their animals in order to reduce their weight. In consequence of this, the animals arrived in Malta in a deplorable state and could not compete with live stock from the Argentine. Serbia's export trade in live stock is thus, at least momentarily, dead.

The harvest was disappointing this year, and the quantity produced fell far below expectations. It is hoped that next year, if weather conditions are favourable, there will be a large increase in the cereal yield. Metal ploughs are being used to a greater extent, and, as these will plough deeper, they will reach virgin soil. It is hoped also that colonisation will help agriculture. The system is not working quite as well as had been expected. The Dalmatian colonists cannot stand the severe winter, and many have left the settlements. The failure of the harvest also meant much hardship for the colonists, who are now very badly off. The Cossack colony on the Kossovo plain is said to be doing well. Successful pig and poultry farms have been started in the Kumanovo and Stip districts.

Opium has been cultivated, and owing to the high price obtainable—810 dinars per oka—producers have done well. The actual output was, however, considerably less than in former years, chiefly, it is thought, owing to the fact that the land is impoverished. The question of improving the quality of the land is being investigated by the Ministry of Agriculture. Cotton has been cultivated to a very small extent, as, owing to the cost and difficulty of transport, cultivation on a larger scale would not have been profitable.

As regards industry, there has been greater activity than in the two previous years. In Skoplje an electric flour mill has been started with a capital of 15,000,000 dinars, and it is noped that it will be able to maintain an average output of fifty metric tons a day. The mill hopes later to compete in foreign markets, but with present transport rates, this is clearly impossible—as the cost of transport is higher from Skoplje to Salonika than from America to Salonika. The Vardar Bank has opened a motor repair shop which promises well. A factory for making bricks, tiles, and drain pipes has also been started at Skoplje. At Mitrovitza a sawmill capable of an annual output of 60,000 cubic metres and employing up to six hundred men is now working. New mills have also been built at the following towns: Kumanovo, Bujanovatz, and Petch. At the latter town furniture is now being made.

There is great need for factories for the preparation of cotton, opium, rice, drying fish and meat and preserving fruits. With regard to mines, there is little evidence that the authorities intend to make any endeavour to exploit them for the present. In this respect capital, technical knowledge, and initiative are lacking. During the current year banks with small capitals have been opened at most of the larger towns in Southern Serbia, including Strumnitza, Ghilane, Veles, Ghevgheli, Stip and Kumanovo.

Labour is scarce and very dear, while skilled labour is practically unobtainable. Employers of skilled labour complain that as soon as a man is master of his trade, he sets up for himself and will no longer work in a subordinate position in a factory. Thus, although there is a factory in Skoplje for making doors, window frames, etc., most of those who have built houses this year have employed small carpenters or even masons to make their doors, etc., for them. Domestic servants are almost unobtainable. The Government Tobacco Monopoly absorbs many of this class, and it is considered less degrading to live on municipal and church charity than to work in a private house. A washerwoman or charwoman earns 30 dinars a day, she must be given three square meals a day, and her strength must be kept up at frequent intervals with Turkish coffee, raki and tobacco. In spite of these demands, which increase her real wages to something approaching the salary of a field officer, it is with the greatest difficulty that she is induced to work. Another factor in the labour problem in this district is the constant recurrence of national and religious holidays. It is not unusual for work to stop for three days in a week; and it is difficult to see how factories in this district can ever join in world competition if they must remain idle nearly half the year.

As regards the various methods employed by different countries to foster trade in this district, the comparison between British and German methods is still made to the disadvantage of the former. Whereas, it is alleged, the German merchant sends a representative to study the exact needs of the market, and produces an article exactly identical with that in general use, the British merchant endeavours to place on the market goods which are nearly but not quite what the population is accustomed to. The population, both town and country, is extremely conservative in its tastes, which accounts for the fact that some hundred Skoplje merchants visited the Liubliana Fair, as soon as it was known that they would find there the class of article they had imported from Austria before the war. Exchange conditions render it difficult, if not impossible, for merchants to turn to the United Kingdom for fresh openings. An article once introduced here is with difficulty ousted, as is shown by the fact that British cotton yarns and sewing cottons still enjoy a virtual monopoly here in spite of very keen Greek and Italian competition.

DALMATIA.

The following extracts are taken from the annual report on Dalmatia of Mr. Nicholas Peric, H.M. Consular Agent at Split:—

Every year the volume of business increases, especially at Split, Sibenik, and Dubrovnik. When inland transport improves, business will still further expand, as the whole of Western Bosnia and Herzegovina are buyers from the Dalmatian markets. It was expected that commerce during the year would be done on a sound basis, but owing to the great fluctuations in the exchange, many merchants, fearing further depreciation, bought large quantities of goods of every kind, mostly colonial, often borrowing the money with which to buy. The new regulations of September, 1922, controlling imports, the financial crisis, and the foreign loan made the dinar temporarily rise in value. Holders of large stocks, hoping for an improvement, began to sell their goods, but no buyers were found owing to a lack of cash. Large quantities of textile goods were imported from Czecho-Slovakia, colonial goods from Italy, and machinery from Germany.

A great improvement is shown in the shipping trade for the year. The coasting trade is extended as far as Corfu. Several lines serve Bari and Trieste. Even without the State subvention, the shipping companies gave a good return for the year. There has been an amalgamation of the four shipping companies: Dalmatia, Hungaro-Croat, Hrvatsko Drustvo u Senju, and the Plovitba at Punta under the name of Jadranska Plovidba Susak, with a paid-up capital of 12 million gold dinars, with 80 vessels for the coasting trade, the most important company of its kind in the Mediterranean Sea. New lines, Trieste and Bari, and Ancona and Bari are to be opened. During the last two months of 1922 several British ships took their cargo, consisting of cement, bauxite, dried plums, calcareous earth and timber, from Split, Sibenik and Gruz.

Dalmatia has only ten to twelve properly called local banks with Dalmatian capital, but a great number of branches of Croatian and Slovenian banks and three Italian banks. Banking business is well developed, especially in foreign exchange. Most of the banks are largely interested in the country's industries. Rates of interest are very high, and with the commissions amount to from 13 to 15 per cent. per annum.

Motor Cycles.

An interesting little brochure on motor-cycles issued by the British Cycle and Motor Cycle Manufacturers and Traders Union which has just reached me serves to draw further attention to the ever-growing popularity of this means of locomotion. The motor-cycle has rapidly become the motor-car of the person of very moderate means. For reasons which are obvious, we, in this country, are never likely to see the extension of the use of motor-cars on anything like the scale that America has gone in for, a fact for which people who have to use the roads (already quite sufficiently difficult, especially in the larger centres) are profoundly thankful; but there is every reason to anticipate, as time goes on, a very great development of the use of motor-cycles. As cheaper machines are put on the market (and some very reasonably priced machines can be obtained at the present time) this movement will be accelerated, for the individual whose tastes incline to the "wheel" has the very obvious incentive that by the use of the motor-cycle he can do journeys much cheaper than by the railway, while in a very great number of cases, riding at a speed of not more than 20 miles per hour, he can actually arrive at his destination quicker than a train can take him. There is, further, of course, the priceless advantage that the route can be of his own choosing. He can do as he pleases, and diverge at intervals to explore places off the beaten track. The rapid growth of the pastime (though that is not quite the right term to apply to it) will give special interest to the coming motor-cycle show at Olympia in October, when the growth of the industry is sure to be marked by the exhibition of many new and interesting types of machines.

Question of Overseas Markets.

That there should be a good and growing market for motor-cycles in many regions of the Near East is beyond question. Of course, in a good many districts conditions are quite unfavourable for motor-cycling, for even if the mountainous nature of the terrain is not an insuperable handicap, the bad roads put motor-cycling out of the question. But drawbacks of this kind are absent in countries like Egypt and Palestine, where the roads are extremely good; in Palestine, indeed, some of the roads are as good as they are in this country. Provided economic conditions are favourable (which, unfortunately, is not yet the case), there would appear to be no reason why there should not be a considerable development of motor-cycling in the Near East, more especially with the advent of the cheap machine. Emphatically the market is one for motor-cycle manufacturers to keep in mind, and if they are wise they will take steps to meet potential requirements now.

The Indo-European Cable Achievement.

The story of the reconstruction of this line was told very fully in last week's issue, but I should like to add my testimony to the value of the achievement in bringing a line 3,800 miles in length (not 3,000, as it was made to appear by a printer's error) into operation again in the face of the numerous and serious difficulties that had to be faced. The work in the Caucasus was particularly difficult, though in saying that I do not wish for one moment to minimise the problems that arose in regard to other sections, and the company is justly entitled to the heartiest congratulations on the conclusion of this enterprise.

Electrically Heated Furnaces.

A new type of electrically heated furnace has recently been introduced on the market by a firm which specialises in the production of these furnaces designed to take commodities in bulk. The furnace is constructed with refractory bricks, dovetailing into one another, and on the visible face of the bricks are three grooves that carry the heating wires. The bricks at the top of the furnace are so fitted that they can be hung beneath girders. Boiler-plate casing surrounds the furnace, the space between the casing and the bricks being filled with insulating material. A temperature of 800 degrees Cent. can be reached in about half an hour.

BRITISH EMPIRE EXHIBITION.

The board of the British Empire Exhibition, in their report for July, state that the progress of construction is receiving constant attention, as the exhibition is dated to open early in April. Some delays have been caused by the obligation of Dominions and Colonies to refer to their home executives on certain questions, but all are fully aware of the necessity for expediting the work. The financial position to the end of June shows that the actual expenditure to then was £1,240,106, as compared with an estimated expenditure of £1,443,481. All the space available for commercial and industrial exhibits in the Indian section has been allotted. There was an increase in applications for space in the Palace of Engineering and the Palace of Industry in July of over 49,850 sq. ft. The area reserved in the Palace of Industry for associations, etc., who are organising their respective sections, for which allotments are not yet issued pending completion of arrangements, amounts to approximately 21,450 sq. ft. In addition there are provisional applications in hand as follows:—Palace of Engineering, 16,817 sq. ft.; Palace of Industry, 7,250 sq. ft. This leaves a balance not applied for to date of the total floor space in both buildings of 45,361 sq. ft.

The production of the Indo-Burma Oilfields for June was 4,456 barrels, being 3,100 from Yenanma field and 1,356 from Padaukpin field.

At the forthcoming All-Russian Agricultural Exhibition at Moscow, a number of leading Czecho-Slovak makers of agricultural machinery will be represented.

THE MARKET FOR FLOUR IN CONSTANTINOPLE.

The following extracts are taken from a report, based on an article in a French contemporary, on the market for flour in Constantinople by the Acting Commercial Secretary to the British High Commission :—

Before the war the consumption of flour in the city and suburbs of Constantinople amounted to approximately 1,800,000 sacks of 72 kilos annually, i.e., approximately 5,000 sacks per day. The proportion of foreign flour imported was, of course, dependent upon the quality and quantity of the wheat harvest in Turkey. As a general estimate it may be stated that the importance of foreign flour during a year of good harvests amounted to 40 per cent. of the total consumption, but in years of bad harvests it rose to 60 or even 80 per cent. The main supplies of wheat came from Russia, followed by Bulgaria, Roumania, France and Italy.

The following statistics show the importance of foreign wheat during a year of average harvests (in sacks of 73 kilos): Russia, 350,000; Bulgaria, 120,000; Roumania, 110,000; Marseilles, 100,000; Italy, 40,000; Hungary and other countries, 10,000 sacks of 10,100 kilos—730,000.

Since the Armistice, France, Roumania, Bulgaria and Italy have prohibited the exportation of flour, and Russia is no longer in a position to export. Large importations were received from America, which during the past four years has supplied Constantinople almost to the exclusion of all other countries. Since the application of the new tariffs, the importation of flour has considerably decreased. The import duty of 475 piastres per 100 kilos is almost prohibitive, whilst the duty on wheat is 150 piastres per 100 kilos. The result of the application of these duties was to give a much needed stimulus to the local milling industry, the majority of the mills having been hitherto obliged to close down. There has been a large demand for wheat, but Bulgaria and Roumania have been unable to maintain adequate supplies and large quantities are being received from America.

The following is a list of the local mills at present in working order, giving their capacity in sacks per 24 hours:—D'Aivanserai, 1,800; Pacha-Limani, 400-500; Kassim-Pacha, 600; Hasskeuy, 1,500; Kemer-Alti, 450; Kadi-Keuy, 120; Djibali, 800-1,000; Geuk-Sou, 200; Daridja, 450-500; Bechiktache, 100; Prinkipo, 700; Moumhané, 350-400; Balat, 400.

It will be seen that, assuming the average daily consumption of flour in Constantinople at 5,000-5,500 sacks, the output of the local mills is adequate to the needs of the town. In actual practice large quantities of flour are still imported, with a result that only a few of the local mills can be kept employed to their full capacity.

A great handicap to the encouragement of local production of wheat lies in the fact that the best American flour can be sold on the market, after payment of customs duties, at 1,050 piastres per sack of 63½ kilos, Australian at 730 piastres per sack of 68 kilos, whilst native flour, inferior in quality to imported flours, is sold at a loss at 1,010 piastres per 72 kilos. The result is, of course, that the local grower is discouraged from increasing his production and a strong demand has arisen for an increase in the import duties on imported flour in order that the local products may be able to compete.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN GOVERNMENT'S POLICY

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

Cairo, August 2.

It is announced in this morning's newspapers that the Government has decided to enter the cotton market as a purchaser, with a view to causing a rise in prices by holding up supplies which would otherwise be placed on the market by growers in need of immediate cash. No official announcement of the Government's reported decision has yet been made, but there is every reason to suppose that the Press forecasts are accurate. The decision is surprising, seeing that both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance had been thought to disbelieve in Government intervention as a cure for the present low price levels of Egyptian cotton. The Financial Adviser, Mr. Dowson, is strongly opposed to the course now adopted. It will be remembered that a similar policy was followed in 1921, when the Government bought extensively, and realised a substantial profit on its transactions. But on that occasion the Financial Adviser pointed out, in his annual report, that the realising of a profit instead of a loss had been due to nothing but good fortune, and that further experiments of the same kind were likely to have the opposite result. The Financial Adviser also emphasised the undesirability of using public money derived from general taxation for schemes designed to benefit only a small section of the inhabitants of the country. He furthermore demonstrated that the actual result in the way of price-raising of purchases on the comparatively small scale that any Government would care to sanction must be insignificant. The price of cotton would continue to be regulated, like the price of everything else, by the laws of supply and demand. The Government has resisted several recent attempts to rush it into taking the step which it has now sanctioned. But latterly there has been a sustained and vigorous offensive on the part of the big cotton growers to induce the Government to come in as a buyer.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Rather Active.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ended August 3, state:—

Since our last report the futures market has been rather active, but at the close the undertone was again somewhat weak. To last week's dullness a series of active markets has succeeded, this being mainly due to the three following factors—(1) The rectification of the Egyptian stock in Liverpool, which from 88,000 bales has been brought down to 68,000 bales; (2) the announcement of the Bureau condition for July of the American crop at 67.2, a figure well below expectations; (3) the publication of a communiqué by the Council of Ministers, by which the Government announces its decision to intervene shortly in the market as a buyer. The market has been pushed up almost exclusively by speculative purchases, the trade taking practically no interest at all. Whether the above factors will have the effect of shaking the trade out of its present apathetic state is now to be seen. We are of the opinion that if this does not take place the advance secured might be lost as easily as it was gained. A rumour has been spread that it is the intention of the Government to buy solely Sakellaridis cotton, and that had the effect of making the difference between November Sakellaridis and October Ashmouni widen to $4.45, against $3.98 a week ago. The communiqué of the Government is drawn up in rather vague terms, and we should prefer to wait for something more concrete to happen before we express an opinion on the consequences of the decision taken. The decrease of the Egyptian stock in Liverpool has so far had but little effect on the prices there, and the parity between Alexandria and Liverpool has been maintained almost unchanged; however, we think that with imports in Liverpool decreasing considerably during the next two months dearer prices in Liverpool should be witnessed in the near future. This week's receipts amounted to 3,523 krs., and the total since September 1 now stands at 6,633,875 krs. Exports have this week amounted to 79,021 krs., and the stock now stands at 1,020,034 krs. against 1,095,532 krs. a week ago and 1,650,501 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—Minet-el-Bassal continues very quiet, and no improvement in the demand from abroad is to be noticed. Sales amount to about 2,700 bales, of which we estimate 1,900 bales Sakellaridis and 800 bales Uppers, with a few bales of outside growths. Holders show no disposition to force sales, and have been encouraged by the bullish Bureau report from Washington and the announcement that the Egyptian Government intend to intervene as buyers in the Cotton market.

Sakellaridis.—All grades have been dealt in, but the lower grades have been less in demand, presumably as they are so dear. Prices for spot against contracts are about at last week's rates.

Uppers.—The bulk of the business has been in the better grades, and the lower grades have been somewhat neglected. Prices of spot against contracts are generally appreciably dearer than last week, except the low grades, which are without much change.

Brown and White.—Are neglected, and only a few bales have been done. Quotations of spot are generally dearer for brown and without much change for white.

The Crop Position.

Crop 1923.—There is again very little to report. The pink bollworm has made its appearance all over the Delta, but it is yet too early to express any opinion on the probable damage the crop will ultimately suffer through this pest. News from Upper Egypt is very satisfactory in every respect. Picking in the extra early sown fields will commence in about a fortnight.

The report of the Alexandria General Produce Association for the month of July reads as follows:—

Lower Egypt.—With the exception of some foggy mornings the temperature during July was favourable to the crop. With regard to Sakellaridis, the plants have in general a good appearance, but the crop is from 10 to 15 days behindhand; flowering is irregular; the branches carry less flowers and bolls than in previous years. As to the other varieties, the plants are vigorous and in a forward condition. Flowering is satisfactory; flowers and bolls of the first crop are abundant. On the whole, leaf worm has not caused any damage. Pink bollworm has been observed everywhere; the number of bolls attacked varying from 5 to 15 per cent., according to the district.

Upper Egypt and Fayoum. The temperature has been favourable to the cotton plants, and their appearance is satisfactory. Flowering has taken place under favourable conditions. The plants bear as many flowers and bolls as last year. In certain districts some bolls attacked by the pink bollworm have been observed, but the damage done is insignificant. Water for irrigation all over Egypt has been abundant.

The traffic receipts of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways for the ten days ended July 20, amounted to £E6,912.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Moderate Demand.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended August 8:—

Only a moderate demand has been experienced during the past week, buyers apparently only taking cotton when absolutely forced to do so. The general tendency of the trade at the moment is to wait developments, the majority of spinners expressing the belief that the recent appreciation is not warranted, their views being based mainly on the rather poor prices and offtake for yarns experienced recently in Manchester. Probably, should the present level be maintained, we should find manufacturers encouraged to operate more fully. The daily sales have averaged about 500 bales, Sakel cotton, grading round fully good fair, monopolising as hitherto the greater portion of the business. Uppers have been rather a quiet market, and, generally speaking, holders have been ready to trade at something below the official quotations. The Sudan varieties have only been asked for occasionally, and the resultant business has been very small. White cottons and Affifi have not been mentioned, but there is only a very small stock of these cottons offering here now. The spot sales total 1,800 bales (for four days), against 3,800 (including 300 Sudan) last week. Quotations of uppers and brown are advanced 55 points all round and all grades of Sakels 85 points. Fully good fair Sakel to-day 16.20d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Business Very Restricted.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended August 11 states:—

This market has again been disturbed by a sudden fluctuation in the raw material, the price of American "spot" on Tuesday last being advanced 115 points. The rise has been very detrimental to even the limited amount of negotiation which had been entered into, since merchants, even under more favourable conditions than exist to-day, act with great caution when the raw cotton market is in a state of flux. Inquiry is said to have been on a somewhat larger scale, but the old story has to be repeated that much of it is quite unworkable, and the amount which actually finds its way into the order book is unsatisfactory in the extreme.

Yarn.—Only a poor week has been experienced. Quotations are naturally very irregular, owing to the recent ups and downs in the price of raw cotton. Prices generally may be said to be ¼d. to ½d. per lb. above those of a week ago.

Cloth.—Here also the prices quoted vary considerably for similar articles. Sales effected are mostly for small lots from stock, few merchants being disposed or able to place contracts of any weight for future delivery. A little more business has been transacted for Turkey and the Levant generally, but the principal markets—viz., India and China—continue very quiet.

Raw Cotton.—The reports from America regarding the weather conditions have been only moderate, and whilst at the moment there appears to be an indication of a short crop, this market declines to be stampeded into any precipitate action in the belief of a shortage at the end of July next year. Closing prices are as follows:—American, fully middling, 14.72; Egyptian, fully good fair, 16.05

AGRICULTURAL MACHINERY IN GREECE

The total number of tractors in use in Greece is estimated to be about 400, of which one-half are of American make, 100 of German origin, 50 from the United Kingdom, and the balance from various other countries (says an American Consular report). Imports during 1922 were adversely affected by the high rates of exchange, which not only increased the cost of the tractor to the Greek user, but also increased the cost of fuel.. Crude oil is now being used as a fuel by one English and one German type of tractor.

The small tractor of about 12 horse-power, pulling two ploughs, offers the greatest possibilities for sale in Greece, owing to the limited size of the average farm, which will be still further reduced when the plan of dividing the property of the large landholders among the tenants has been carried out. This, however, will apply only to those landholders who lease the ground to tenant cultivators and receive a part of the crop as compensation. Owners of large estates, who take an active interest in the cultivation of their lands and manage them, will not be affected by this division, and this class offers a promising field for tractors and tractor equipment. Most of the properties to be divided are situated in the north of Greece, in Thessaly and Macedonia, which are the principal agricultural regions, and where expropriation has already begun. It is expected that the tenants who now become proprietors will take an increased interest in the intense cultivation of the soil and in course of time will be able to purchase modern agricultural implements.

Germany, since its return to the Greek market, has taken away the threshing trade from the United States. Although the price of the American machine is lower than the German 54-inch thresher, which is at present offered at $3,000, the straw bruiser supplied with the German machine is claimed to be superior to the American design, causing less breakage of the grain. Steam engines are preferred for driving threshers, as the straw can be used as fuel. Harvesting machines and binders come mostly from the United States. Ploughs are manufactured by two factories in Vole, and in addition to this, the Greek Government has contracted for 20,000 ploughs in Germany on account of reparations.

Increased importations of agricultural implements into Greece depend on the stability of the exchange level much more than on its high rate. The farmers are comparatively prosperous and actively supported by the co-operative societies existing throughout Greece and by the National Bank of Greece, which grants short-term credits both to individual farmers and to co-operative societies. These funds are used for financing the sowing, harvesting and marketing of the crops. The introduction of agricultural implements through the medium of the co-operative societies has not made much progress.

EGYPTIAN CROPS.

The bulletin of the Egyptian Ministry of Agriculture gives the following particulars of crop conditions in July:—

Cotton.—In Lower Egypt the weather conditions were such as to tend to produce more vegetative growth of the plants rather than the boll-formation. This was especially marked in Sakellaridis. In Middle and Upper Egypt the condition of the crop is fairly satisfactory, having slightly improved in certain provinces since last month. Complaints of shortage of water, owing to irrigation of sharâqi lands, were received from a very few localities situated at tail ends of canals. The attacks of cotton worm were mild. Pink boll worm attacks are reported from all districts, but it is too early to forecast the probable degree of the attack. Slight attacks of wilt have also been reported.

Millet (Sêfi).—In Lower Egypt cobs are forming in early-sown fields. In Middle and Upper Egypt the crop is approaching maturity. Harvesting is expected to begin early in August.

Rice (Sêfi).—The weather and water supply are satisfactory. The crop is growing satisfactorily, and promises a normal yield.

Sugar-cane.—The condition of the plants is satisfactory. Watering, manuring, and hoeing were being carried out. The crop is free from pests and disease, except in Minya Province, where a slight attack of stalk-borer has been reported. A normal yield is expected.

Bersim.—Harvesting has been completed. Thrashing and winnowing are general. The yield is below average.

Earthnuts.—The growth of this crop is proceeding normally.

Maize (Nili).—Preparation of land, manuring, and sowing are in progress. Sowing started earlier this year. Where it has already taken place, germination is normal.

The Greek Moratorium Law has been further extended to September 30, and Articles 1 to 6 of the Law to October 31.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Angora Assembly.

The early efforts of the Angora Assembly must not be judged by too high a standard. Things in Turkey are necessarily in a transition stage, and it is in the interests of the world in general that the country should progress along Western lines rather than sink back into chaos. By all means let the Turks be encouraged to aim at a high standard; but there is no need to gird at them because at the beginning they fall short of it. They have given Europe a striking example of what can be achieved by national unity and stedfastness of purpose, and it will be to their advantage if they can appreciate the value of these assets and apply them to their new needs. At present there would seem to be a danger of unity being reduced to the absurdity of a Legislative Assembly without an Opposition. This can never be a natural state of affairs, and can be attained only by some form of terrorism, which at Angora is being exercised through legislative enactments, passed by constitutional machinery, but entirely contrary to the spirit of personal liberty that must form the basis of any progressive State. The members of the Assembly are very new to their work. If, as is stated, 185 out of 217 are soldiers, and all are of one party, there need be no surprise that they are inclined to ignore the boundary line between discipline and sycophancy during the first few weeks. The position at Angora will become tragic only when Mustapha Kemal Pasha allows the flattery of his followers to set the standard of Turkish statesmanship.

Politics in Greece.

Until the general election takes place it is not easy to form a clear opinion of the trend of Greek politics at the present time. M. Zaimis, to whom the country has of recent years accustomed itself to look for temporary relief from political tangles, has refused to take charge of a Coalition Government under the auspices of the Revolutionary Committee, but he has informed the latter that he is forming a new party, to be called the "Reconciliation Party." The title, if not the party, we may hope, will prove of an ephemeral nature; but the foundation on which M. Zaimis proposes to build is not only thoroughly sound, but is also the only one on which Greece can expect to raise a new and lasting edifice of prosperity. There is a healthy frankness in the statement in which M. Zaimis has propounded his views. He points out that the task of the Revolutionary Committee was finished with the demobilisation of the Army, but he is prepared to admit the necessity of their presence in view of the irreconcilable attitude of the Royalists. At the same time he holds the extreme Venizelists responsible for calamities almost as serious as those caused by the Royalists, and he calls upon the Venizelists to abstain as a party from the election and to support candidates of the Reconciliation Party. M. Zaimis is generally believed to be above the reproach of seeking his own interests, and for this reason it may be hoped that his advice will be followed. If his appeal is endorsed by M. Venizelos, there can be little doubt that it will be responded to by the majority of the Venizelists. The Royalists look to General Metaxas, who has also inspired confidence by his refusal to be stampeded into extremism. In the face of a working agreement between General Metaxas and M. Zaimis, the Revolutionary Committee would have no other course open to it than to dissolve itself. The next step in Greek political history should be the scrapping of the names of parties that recall political animosities and the adoption of a nomenclature that would bear some reference to principles or policies.

Great Britain and Cyprus.

The presence in England of M. Spiro Araouso, who came to present a further petition on behalf of Cypriot Greeks for the union of the island with Greece, has afforded the British Government an opportunity for a fresh pronouncement on the future of Cyprus. The demand for union with Greece is again rejected, and it is added that this question must now be considered as closed. The Secretary of State for the Colonies, however, expresses his willingness to consider favourably an increase of Greek representation in the Legislative Assembly in proportion to the population, on condition that an equal increase in the British membership of the Assembly should also be effected. In regard to what is known as the Turkish tribute, but which, in reality, is the payment of a sum of £42,000 annually to shareholders of Turkey's Crimean Loan, the British Government holds that this payment must continue.

The Future of Cyprus.

It is to be hoped, although it is hardly to be expected, that this plain answer to a plain request will put an end at least for a period to the agitation among a number of Greeks in Cyprus for union with Greece. The position of the island, it has to be admitted, presents certain anomalies, and few people will rule it as altogether out of the question that Cyprus should one day be Greek. It has, however, never been united with Greece, and, although, in view of the prominence given of recent years to the cult of nationality, there is an obvious affinity between Cyprus and Greece, at no period in the history of the two would union have proved a greater disservice to both. No weakening in one's belief in the future of Hellenism is entailed by the admission that Greece has on the mainland far too much to engage her attention and to tax her resources at the present moment to make it desirable that she should have Cyprus as an added responsibility, reopening through the Turkish minority on the island a chapter in her relations with Turkey only recently closed. Cyprus, moreover, has been handicapped in the past by having received inadequate attention from the British Government, and it would be fatal to her interests to be handed over at this juncture to a country that has not sufficient money for its own needs. So long as the present agitation for union with Greece lasts there will be a natural reluctance on the part of Great Britain to develop the island for the benefit of people who show themselves incapable of appreciating the British régime. The lack of political intelligence displayed by the agitators for union with Greece, who have persisted in a campaign which has been discountenanced by M. Venizelos and other enlightened Greeks, also acts as a deterrent to any scheme for giving a greater measure of self-government. Great Britain considers herself a trustee not only of the Turkish minority in Cyprus, but also of the thousands of Greeks whose real interests are little likely to be advanced by the townsmen, who, in supporting the agitation, do not overlook the fact that union should bring with it the spoils of office.

M. Raditch.

The mystery of the conflicting statements concerning the whereabouts of M. Raditch, the leader of the Croats in Yugoslavia, who has been variously reported as being in Hungary, in Austria, and still in Croatia, has been cleared up by his arrival in London. As M. Raditch left Yugoslavia clandestinely, it must be supposed that he considered it wiser not to await the decision of the Committee appointed to determine whether his Parliamentary immunity should be raised in order that he might stand his trial on various charges. In these circumstances he will hardly expect to derive much benefit from his visit to England. Public opinion in this country as far as it is interested in Yugoslav politics has been inclined to sympathise with the movement for a less severely centralised system of government in Yugoslavia than that provided for by the existing Constitution. On the other hand, it has no Republican leanings, nor has it much patience with the non possumus attitude in politics which prefers to cry, in rather exaggerated language, for the moon and refuses to listen to any proposals for compromise. Accordingly the chief interest attaching to M. Raditch's visit would seem to centre in its ultimate effect on Yugoslav politics. His own followers will have to decide whether their cause is helped or weakened by his absence. Possibly they may be encouraged to hope that M. Raditch will somehow or other strengthen his position in Yugoslavia by initiating personal relations with the British Government; but on this point they can entirely disabuse their minds. Great Britain has no desire to interfere in Yugoslavia's domestic politics; it is to her interest that the country should compose its political differences by itself, and then, having attained a real unity, enter upon an era of economic progress.

The Arabs of Palestine.

It is to be hoped that the Palestine Arab Delegation, which has once more come to London, will not do harm to the Arab cause by mistaken tactics. British policy in Palestine has been at fault through want of thought and not through want of heart. The policy has now been revised, and rests on the satisfactory basis of common sense and disinterestedness. There can be no better foundation for the government of a mixed community, and British plans are not likely to be thwarted by ex parte pleadings. The Arabs are offered a share in the administration of the country, which will be increased as they give evidence of their administrative capacity. If they refuse to play their part, the administration of the country will be carried on without their help, and the conditions that they deplore will be continued for a longer period owing to their wrong-headedness. Adoption of the policy advocated by the Palestine Arab delegation is to-day out of the question in view of Great Britain's commitments. The British Government has offered a scheme which represents in all the circumstances a fair first stepping-stone towards the National Government for which the Arabs are asking. If the Arabs will help to make a success of this first stage, they will bring the country appreciably nearer the goal in view. Everyone in this country knows that the Arabs form over 90 per cent. of the population in Palestine; but no one is impressed by a delegation which would wish it to be supposed that its claims represent the matured political convictions of every Arab or even of a majority of them. The delegation's case is vitiated by the fact that, whereas many of the Arab rank and file for whom they profess to speak can and do get on with the Jews in their midst, the essence of the leaders' agitation is that no attempt should be made by the Arabs to see whether they cannot pull together with the Jews in a common and sustained effort to promote the interests of the country under the British Mandate. In the course of such an effort there will be abundant opportunity to improve the administration in detail in the light of actual experience.

Indian Constitutional Difficulties.

Now that the talk of a constitutional "crisis" over the salt tax seems almost to have died down in India, it may be worth while to point out that the real crisis, when it comes, is likely to arise in connection with provincial rather than central business. The experimental, and therefore dubious, portions of the Constitution are those which govern the internal working of the provincial administrations, and their relations with the authorities at headquarters. Some experienced critics have been watching to see one or other of the diarchies fly suddenly into pieces as the result of internal strains, while others fear rather that the powers of the Government of India may be so used as to drive one or other of the provinces into revolt, not, of course, armed resistance, but an attitude of definite political hostility. That the first result has not yet occurred is a fact for which the credit must be given to the men who have been working the cumbrous machine, and, most of all, to the exceptionally able Governors of the various provinces. The second danger has now come sufficiently near to call for some notice, though it has not yet materialised. As most of us feared would be the case, the subject involved is religion, and, as most of us expected, the protagonist is Madras.

Religious Endowments in Madras.

The Madras Legislature, which, by the way, consists predominantly of Hindus, has accepted a measure dealing rather drastically with a very thorny subject, the supervision of religious endowments. The Bill falls into a class to which assent must be given by the Viceroy, not the provincial Governor, and conservative Hinduism all over India has now united to bring pressure to bear on Lord Reading to use his veto, on the ground that "religion itself is in danger," as one advocate of interference has hardily asserted. The Viceroy, who apparently cannot share the responsibility for the decision with his Council, is wisely taking his time. He is bound by law to protect religious liberty. If he decides that the Bill infringes this principle, he must withstand the provincial legislature, which is understood to have Lord Willingdon's Government at its back, while if he assents to the Bill, he will probably antagonise those reserve forces of orthodoxy which are very slow to move, but which, when once they are loosed, are still by far the strongest thing in India. Hitherto they have successfully resisted every attempt to secure effective secular control over the huge mass of property consecrated to religious uses. They are not usually inclined to compromise; and, whatever the Viceroy's decision may be, its results are likely to be of great importance for the whole of India.

The Services in India.

A useful, if unpretentious, contribution to the discussion of the great Service question in India has reached us from the Association of European Government Servants at Naini Tal, in the form of a pamphlet setting out some typical family budgets for middle-aged officers. We are not, of course, in a position to pronounce a definite judgment on the actual figures presented, but we can detect no serious exaggeration, and we are not prepared to dissent from the conclusion drawn, that a married officer with a small family cannot possibly live decently on his pay, even in what used to be regarded as the cheapest part of India. If he has no private means, he must either run into debt, or cheat his children of a decent education. Is it any wonder that officers in this position are critical over the action of the India Office in the whole matter? If it takes eleven months to bring a Royal Commission into existence, how many months will it take before its recommendations have received effect? And how many officers will break down in the meantime? Such are the questions that are being asked all over India just now.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

The Arrest of De Valera.

It came almost as a relief to find one's interest shifting in the last week from Europe to Ireland. Day by day we look to find something happening about the Ruhr, and nothing ever does happen; so that when we read that Mr. de Valera had been arrested the news, not of much significance itself perhaps, seemed, by comparison with negative Continental action, quite exciting. Mr. de Valera has always been a rather imponderable figure, and the most intelligent have found it difficult accurately to "place" him. Of his ability there is no doubt, but apparently the Cosgrave Government thought the time had come when it could safely run the risk of raising him to a martyr's fate. It is said that his arrest will gain votes for the Government, but firm action in Ireland does not always have the same results as elsewhere, and the only safe thing is to be dull and wait and see.

Whatever hold de Valera still has in his own country—I mean Ireland—it is fairly certain that America now has little use for him. Irish-Americans have not exactly approved of the way in which their thousands have been squandered in a losing cause, and though, of course, there are hundreds of irreconcilables among them, they are suspicious and tired of this particular barren intellectual.

The Entente.

To read the newspapers, one would imagine that the Entente is in hourly danger of extinction, but such can scarcely be the case when our Ministers at such a time as this can go abroad on holidays. The reply of the French and Belgian Governments to the British Note is to be published to-morrow, and, whatever may be its effect on public opinion, obviously it can make no immediate difference to the situation. England, it would seem, is now beginning to recognise that she cannot further weaken France's position in the Ruhr, for all this talk about getting paid our debts from France is at the moment merely talk; and the only "separate action" of which we are capable is disapprovingly to recognise that France has indulged in "separate action."

But for the time being the holiday spirit is on us, and we are Little Englanders till about September, after which we promise to come to our senses again, hoping that the Entente still exists. It is not astonishing, this fatigue of British people with European affairs: we never did well understand them, and the fact, indisputable as it may be, that we are a Continental Power, will take time to sift into the minds of our people.

The explanation of the present dallying may be in the fact that our Premier wishes to consult the Imperial Conference on the whole question of Reparations, and then, having got something like unanimity in the matter, to throw the whole weight of the British Empire into the question. I have no particular reason to believe that a verdict by our colonial representatives would be adverse to France. but should it so turn out I doubt—though it may be heresy to say so—even then whether the scale would be weighted against the present occupants of the Ruhr. Had we acted months ago the result would have been very different.

The Dockers' Strike.

The strike of the dock workers at the London docks is finally at an end. Now what it is that has kept men from their occupation all this time is more than a mystery. At first a huge cry went up that the strikers were being dole-fed. but, to judge by the way in which that cry has died down, it seems to have been a barren explanation. People of the Morning Post type say angry words about intimidation, unauthorised leaders, Bolshevism, and so on, but the public's ears are mostly shut to that sort of thing.

The workers are now claiming an official inquiry into their grievances, particularly over the accuracy of the index figure as reflecting the actual cost of living in the East End of London. Although the riverside population of London is not the most respectful of the majesty of the law, yet it might perhaps be no bad thing were the official estimate of the cost of living revised, or at least remade.

The Theatres.

If there is one class of men over whom appeals for sympathy are more frequently put out and less genuine feeling expressed it is that of theatre-managers. Every summer and autumn we hear the usual bleat that theatres are run at a loss, and yet we listen unmoved to the stories of the certain ruin of managers. We know so well these generous souls, whose sole object in squandering their moneys is the provision of public enjoyment.

But, joking apart, the recent crop of plays has not been very "successful," and revivals are being freely indulged in. Already five revivals are being acted, and this week we are to have Chesterton's "Magic" and Anthony Hope's "Prisoner of Zenda." Chesterton's brilliant piece is to be played at the Everyman, where there is, I should think, a very good chance of its attaining something more than popularity.

After August we are, it appears, going to have an orgy of first nights. Most important of all we are to see, early in September, Flecker's "Hassan" at His Majesty's, with Mr. Henry Ainley as Hassan: and a little later is coming Mr. Somerset Maughan's "Our Betters." Altogether, it looks as though the forthcoming theatrical season may be even stimulating.

Seals and Fish.

Some visitors to the seaside get quite excited when they catch sight of seals, though, in fact, there are scores of them off most of the English coast. But this year they are particularly abundant off the North coast of Norfolk, so much so that they are driving away the fish from this part of the coast. They are, in fact, a plague, and the Eastern Fisheries, I believe, are offering £1 for a skin. It is by no means difficult to get close to them on sandbanks. I met a man the other day who shot seven in a few hours. Why they should be so plentiful this year I do not know, but certainly they are not liked by our fishermen, and, being only small ones, their skins are not of great value. But to the land-lubber they are fascinating fellows, and the way in which they contrive to make a wriggling fish descend into their throat is very fascinating.

Motor-Car Accidents.

An indignant wail of protest is being raised against the number of motor-car accidents now taking place on the roads. It may be fancy, but it certainly seems as though there were far more and worse drivers on the road than formerly; half-experienced, middle-aged men or young females, charmingly ignorant of mechanical repairs, abound nowadays. Yet it is said, authoritatively, that it is not from such classes of relatively incapables that accidents derive; it is rather from the "best" drivers, those, that is, whose temperament drives them either to speed or to drink, that disasters come. Carelessness and negligence, in short, are far more dangerous than ignorance; it is rather the man who cannot and will not stop than the man who can do nothing else who is the public nuisance. At present it is difficult to put the law on to reckless drivers, but something must be done about it.

The Occupation of England.

While we are speculating on the duration of the French occupation of the Ruhr, Professor Bury, of Cambridge, has been forming the conclusion that the hitherto accepted date of the end of the Roman occupation of Britain—410 A.D., is wrong. Every schoolboy—except those who are taught that English history begins in 1066—has been told that the Roman eagles left England for ever in 410: but this complacency is now upset by Professor Bury's putting the occupation as lasting thirty or forty years longer. That his evidence and conclusions will be accepted seems most probable; it is all part of the trend, which I mentioned a little time ago, to recognise and not to obscure our descent from the Romans. And it is really comforting, not merely to imagine, but to know, that the foundations of our greatness were laid in Roman processes—though the thought, with the mortality of Empire implied, need not be pressed too far!

Yet the stuff of the people of Britain has always been fine, and these islands were inhabited by a worthy race before the Romans and Normans came to make that race a people. Incidentally, we were a beautiful and artistic people. These attributes are generally denied to us, and we ourselves have certainly allowed them to become obscured—witness the amusement which Professor Walford Davies caused the other day when he said we were fundamentally artistic. But I should not be surprised if, after our industrial period, artistic inclinations reassert themselves in this people. I was recently given an ingenious ground for this belief by an artist who was maintaining that the ancient Greeks were not, as is commonly supposed, a beautiful people, but an ugly, squat race. Briefly his argument was this: It is common for mankind to desire, to dream of, and finally to deify what they have not; and the beautiful statues of Greek sculpture (this was the result of long archæological research on his part at Athens) were not representatives of Greek citizens, but of slaves from Britain, whom the Greek artists, themselves unpossessed of beautiful form, were quick to recognise as perfectly shaped. There is hope for our Olympic Games runners after all!

The Cricket Season.

Although there are several very interesting matches yet to be played, the fact that the issue of the county championship is now practically settled has made the newspaper student of cricket a little less furious than he should be at the intrusion of football news in the paper in August. Yorkshire, there can be little doubt, will be champions, and indisputably they have proved the hardest side this year to beat. They may not be the most attractive—Sutcliffe is the only man in the side with any of the graces of the South—but they have built up an almost infallible and certainly admirable efficiency. In balance they are far beyond any other team now playing, and their position at the head is in spite of all the anomalies and injustices of the present system of scoring points.

On the whole, it has been a very interesting season, marked chiefly, perhaps, by a revival in amateur batting. The professionals' batting honours are at the moment shared between Hendren and Mead, with the more versatile at the head, while the season's "discovery" has been Tate, the son of the old Sussex cricketer who once played for England.

The Elections Postponed.

The initial stage of Egypt's first parliamentary elections, namely the appointment of elector delegates, which was to have taken place on the 22nd of this month, has been postponed until September 10. It has been found by the inspectors appointed by the Ministry of the Interior to examine the electoral lists that these rolls are full of inaccuracies and omissions. The trouble has apparently arisen through the local authorities' inability to comprehend the circulars issued by the Ministry at the time of the compilation of the lists. But, even had the official instructions been entirely understandable and the local officials never so intelligent and painstaking, a fairly large number of errors could only be expected on this, the first occasion that any rolls of the kind have been compiled in Egypt. From what I hear the new date fixed for the voting for the elector delegates will scarcely allow sufficient time for the rectification and, in some cases, completely new compilation of the lists, and it is probable that the elections will not take place before October.

The system to be followed in appointing the elector delegates is that each group of thirty voters will elect from their number a delegate. Voters will be divided up into groups of thirty by the local authorities, who, in making the division, will be guided by considerations of the places of residence of voters, and will endeavour to secure that each group shall consist of neighbours. The actual election of deputies will be effected by the votes of the elector delegates. Delegates, to be eligible to stand for election, must have been nominated by at least thirty elector delegates of the constituency for which the candidature is proposed. For the election of senators there is a second elector delegate stage, the elector delegates appointed to vote in respect of candidates for the Chamber of Deputies being themselves divided up into groups of five, and each group electing a delegate to vote in the senatorial elections.

It is obvious that, with such a plan, an election campaign in this country must differ greatly from the tussle in the constituencies which precedes a General Election at home. In the first place, candidates cannot be nominated until after the elector delegates have been selected by the voters. Partly for this reason, and partly, no doubt, on account of the unfamiliarity of the local political parties with electioneering procedure, there is as yet very little sign of the impending struggle. Each of the three parties, the Zaghlulists, the Constitutional Liberals, and the Nationalists, declares that it will fight every constituency; but it is very doubtful whether this programme will be realised. In the case of the Nationalists, it is almost certain that the party will not waste its energies in fighting all the very many seats where there is not the remotest chance of success. The same consideration must apply, to some extent, to the Constitutional Liberals, and even, though in vastly less degree, to the Zaghlulists. There is at present no provision in the Egyptian electoral law for the forfeiture, by a candidate who has polled only a minute fraction of the votes registered, of any part of the sum deposited by him on his nomination. If the parties adhere to their presently declared intention of contesting every constituency, it is likely that an early enactment of the Egyptian Parliament would be aimed at penalising frivolous candidatures financially.

The Parties' Programmes.

While it is inevitable that the political groups should have been unable hitherto to draw up lists of their candidates, it is more surprising that they have not attracted greater public attention to their various programmes. Two of the parties, the Liberal Constitutionals and the Nationalists, have quite definite programmes, which have been re-enunciated fairly recently, and which the party leaders have stated to be the principles on which the parties' candidates will be recommended to the suffrages of the electors.

The Nationalist programme has the merit of being clear, short, and to the point. It can be summed up in three sentences:—

(a) Complete independence and military evacuation of Egypt, the Sudan, and all the "dependencies of the Sudan," which at any time were under the Egyptian flag and which have since for any reason been ceded to other Powers. The party leaders point out that they do not expect to achieve all their demands under this head by negotiation with Great Britain alone. It is realised that Italy and other Powers are concerned; but the Nationalists point out their programme is not drawn up solely with a view to future relations with Great Britain only.

(b) The abolition of the Capitulations.

(c) An absolute refusal to enter into any negotiations with Great Britain until she has completely evacuated Egypt and the Sudan.

It should be pointed out that nobody outside the Nationalist Party, which is, numerically, very unimportant, considers that the above programme comes within the range of practical politics. Most Egyptians consider that the Nationalists might as well demand the moon as what they are at present asking for.

The Liberal Constitutionals.

The Liberal Constitutionals also have a definite programme, which was enunciated by Adly Pasha Yeghen when the party was originally formed, and which has recently been republished by Al Siyassa, the party's organ. It is as follows:—

(a) Complete independence, by which is meant no foreign interference in Egypt's external or internal affairs.

(b) No military occupation of Egypt by a foreign Power.

*Under this heading appear weekly or at regular intervals communications from correspondents in Egypt, the Sudan, Roumania, Yugoslavia, Greece, Bulgaria, Albania, Turkey, Palestine, Irak and Persia.

Digitized by Google

(c) No settlement of the Sudan question which shall separate that country from Egypt, or shall in any way encroach on Egypt's sovereignty, or shall prejudice Egypt's vital interests (i.e., in the waters of the Nile) in the Sudan.

(d) The reservation of the question of the Capitulations to eventual negotiations between Egypt and the Capitulatory Powers. The modification of the Capitulations to a form more consistent with Egypt's position as an independent State, or their total abolition, is contemplated, but, at the same time, Adly Pasha declared that foreigners should be assured as adequate protection in the future as they had enjoyed in the past.

(e) The immediate appointment of Egyptian diplomatic representatives abroad.

(f) Egypt to become a member of the League of Nations.

(g) Political partisan differences to be sunk and a united front to be presented in demanding the realisation of the above aims.

The Zaghlulists.

As for the Wafd, it is impossible to say what their present programme is. They have never really got beyond the first article of their political faith, "Istiklal el Tam (complete independence) for Egypt and the Sudan," and that solitary demand has never been clearly defined. Perhaps their policy is best described as being all things to all men. When, as sometimes happens, prominent members of foreign communities are being entertained to a tea party at one of the hotels, the Capitulations are likened to the laws of the Medes and Persians. On the other hand, an electoral meeting in Sayeda Zenab, or some other purely native quarter, produces plentiful demands that the foreigner shall no longer be allowed to enjoy privileges denied to the Egyptian. The Wafd has always been the party of personalities rather than principles. The magic name of Zaghlul covers a multitude of inconsistencies. When Saad says Turn, they all turn. For example, it was they who first, from the Egyptian side, suggested the compensation of retiring foreign officials, a proposal which, now carried out by the Yehia Cabinet, has evoked from the Wafd a protest so strong as narrowly to escape prosecution. The genius of the Wafd lies in opposition, in destructive criticism rather than constructive policy. If anything is to be gathered from recent Wafd utterances, it is that one of the earliest acts of a Zaghlulist Government will be to impeach its political rivals for high treason. The fire-eating William Effendi Makram, the present spokesman of the Wafd, at an election meeting at Boulac last week compared the Liberal Constitutionals to murderers, incapable of feeling remorse, while their spokesmen were liars. This kind of thing, unfortunately, seems to be considered admirable political argument, and in Egypt goes down uncommonly well.

As will have been noted, none of the parties look beyond the forthcoming negotiations with Great Britain. That is, indeed, the root of the whole matter. The first Parliamentary elections in Egypt are going to be fought on one single issue—Egypt's relations with Great Britain.

GREECE.

Athens, August 4.

Peace.

The news of the signing of the Peace Treaty at Lausanne was received here without enthusiasm—one could almost say with apathy. When the Treaty of Sèvres was signed three years ago, Athenians went delirious with joy, congratulating and even embracing each other in the streets; the entire town was then beflagged, Church bells were ringing merrily, and huge coloured maps of Greater Greece were posted everywhere, while at night the main thoroughfares and public buildings were illuminated with myriads of multi-coloured lights. And now? How different everything is! Had it not been for the big headlines in the morning papers and the Thanksgiving Service held at the Cathedral, one would have hardly realised that the curtain had at last fallen on the final act of the Anatolian drama.

Despite their exterior apathy, however, there is no doubt that the Greek people were relieved to hear the good news. One must remember that the country has been in a state of war for nearly eleven years, and it seems too good to be true that it will at last be given a chance to resume its old peaceful existence, and will be able to give its full attention to the many thorny internal problems which it is now facing.

The Political Situation.

The most important of these problems is, of course, the General Election. The date has not yet been fixed; but the Revolutionary leader, Colonel Plastiras, informed me a few days ago that, if everything goes well, it would be held on the second or third Sunday in October. (Greek General Elections always take place on a Sunday.) It is naturally too early yet to say how many and which of the parties will appear in the pre-electoral arena, but it goes without saying that the struggle will be confined principally to the Venizelists and the anti-Venizelists. As M. Venizelos absolutely refuses to return to Greece, the former are, at present, without a leader. The latter can boast of many chiefs, but the one feared most by both the Revolutionaries and the Liberals is General Metaxas, under whose banner are united all the partisans of the old régimes. In order effectively to oppose General Metaxas, the Revolutionary Government is endeavouring to create a new party called the "National Coalition Group," consisting of all the moderate political elements in the country, whether they be Venizelists or "Antis." The leadership of this "Coalition" has already been offered to M. Alexander Zaimis, who, in addition to being persona grata with the Allies, enjoys an immense prestige among the Greek people, as he has always succeeded in steering clear of parties and the various political cliques which have done so much harm to Greece. Without committing himself in any way, M. Zaimis informed Colonel Plastiras that he would very carefully think the matter over and announce his decision within the next few days. It is generally believed, however, that the conditions which M. Zaimis will set forth will be considered unacceptable by the "Revolution," in which case the leadership of the Coalition will either be entrusted to the present Prime Minister, Colonel Gonatas, or the idea of a National Coalition will be dropped altogether, each party being left to fight its own battle.

Another question which is also receiving the most serious attention of the Government is that of ratifying the Peace Treaty. To wait until November, when the Constituent Assembly will probably be convoked, is out of the question, more especially seeing that the exchange of populations—a very urgent matter indeed—cannot commence until the Treaty has been ratified by both Athens and Angora. In order to overcome this difficulty, it is proposed that the Treaty be ratified either by a plebiscite or by a legislative decree. As there exists some doubt, however, regarding the validity of either of these procedures, the matter has been placed before M. Venizelos, whose reply has not yet been received

The American Near East Relief Committee will discontinue its feeding operations in Constantinople and other places outside Greece as from August 15. The American organisation had already informed the Hellenic Government that its responsibilities would end with the signing of the Peace Treaty.

The new Bulgarian Minister in Athens, M. Dobreff, presented this morning his letters of credence to King George II.

BULGARIA.

Sofia, August 14.

The Naroden Sgovor.

The fusion of parties has at last taken place. A Protocol, signed on August 10 between the Democrats, Radicals, and Narodno-Progressists, brings these parties together into what is to be called the Democratic Union. The Union will work together with the Naroden Sgovor (National Entente) created by the Prime Minister, M. Zankoff. The Union and the Sgovor will probably make an appeal to the country in about two months' time. While their exact strength is as yet unknown, it is considered that they should secure a clear majority in the Sobranye. The Liberal and the Socialist Parties remain outside the Union, but Liberals are lending it their support—and it is not likely that the Socialists will go into active Opposition.

The main Opposition will come from the Communists. It is possible that before the elections take place the Communist Party may be declared outside the law. If this were to happen, the Agrarians would constitute the only Opposition. Meanwhile many Agrarians are turning Communists, as the disorganisation brought on their party by the events of June 9 does not give them any hope of electoral success.

The Naroden Sgovor is gradually becoming a factor of real importance in Bulgarian politics. M. Zankoff appears likely to remain Prime Minister; his relations with the King are good, and the army, which virtually appointed him, continues to support him. During the two months that he has been in power he has been content to allow his Ministers a more or less free hand in reorganising their various departments. But he is not a mere figurehead, as was supposed at first.

The former leaders of the Bourgeois Parties, with one or two possible exceptions, have decided to retire from political life. In doing so they have behaved very wisely, as there is no doubt that both external and internal opinion demanded new men. The younger element who have taken their place are, of course, without experience; but, given a fair chance, there is no reason why they should not justify themselves.

The Ægean Outlet.

Much interest has been evinced here in the correspondence recently published in The Times regarding an outlet on the Ægean Sea for Bulgaria. The official point of view here remains the same. Bulgaria claims that Article 48 of the Treaty of Neuilly should be executed. She considers that this Article cannot be executed unless the territory between Bulgaria and the Ægean is taken away from Greece and then internationalised or put under the League of Nations. Whether her claim will ever be satisfied by the Allies is becoming rather doubtful. The Conference of Lausanne is finished, and Bulgarians fear that the Allies will hesitate to reopen the Near Eastern Question. In the opinion of the writer, however, if the Allies do not reopen the question, it will sooner or later reopen itself.

COLONIAL OUTFITS A SPÉCIALITÉ

Digitized by Google

The Land Reform Bill.

Some two years ago the Agrarians voted a law by which no family was entitled to possess more than 300 decars of land. Persons who possessed more had their land expropriated, and were indemnified. Indemnification was, however, in no manner commensurate with the loss sustained. In addition, the law was executed with a good deal of laxity, and the political adversaries of the Agrarians were more harshly treated than their supporters. Nevertheless, on the whole the measure was a good one, as it enabled many peasants to become self-supporting. As a result of the change of Government, there is a strong movement in favour of the law being repealed. This movement naturally emanates from the persons whose land was expropriated. No decision will be come to until after the elections; but if the Government yield to the pressure which is being brought to bear on them, they will lose a big number of the votes of the rural population. Probably the best thing that can be done is to maintain the law, but at the same time carry out an inquiry into the actual working thereof. If this were done, the peasants would be satisfied, while those persons who have not been properly indemnified will be able to have their cases examined and, if necessary, can be compensated.

A Macedonian Demonstration.

Since June 9 Macedonians in Bulgaria have held themselves very much in reserve. The twentieth anniversary of Macedonia's revolution against Turkish rule was, however, marked by demonstrations held all over Bulgaria. "Macedonia for the Macedonians" was once again the universal cry, and many speeches in favour of autonomy were made. Otherwise there were no incidents, and everything passed off quietly.

PALESTINE.

Jerusalem, August 5.

King Faisal's Visit.

The last two or three weeks have been remarkably free of noteworthy incident. King Faisal's visit to Amman, to his brother Abdullah, the Emir of Transjordania, is the only possible exception, and that is only of secondary interest to Palestine. It has been generally supposed that the visit had, as a main object, to devise concerted action in face of the threatening Wahabis; but King Faisal may also, without loss of dignity, be credited with the desire of seeing the world, and the Emir Abdullah with the desire of displaying the pomp and majesty of his own independent realm and the skill of his Army. Many of the higher Palestinian Government officials went across to Transjordania to pay their respects to King Faisal, as well as delegations representing one thing or another. The Jaffa Arab Congress Executive (as representing the Moslem-Christian Association's grievances) sent a deputation, as also did the Haifa Orthodox Christian Arab Congress. Such delegations may have their point and use, but they are not very obvious. State banquets and military manœuvres seem, however, to have been the main order of the day. The visit followed immediately on the Feast of Kourban Bairam, and so coincided with popular rejoicings. The famous, almost untouched, Græco-Roman amphitheatre at Amman was further adorned on the occasion with a "merry-go-round"!

The Hejaz Railway.

The Hejaz Railway, which was largely wrecked or dismantled during the War, is now reported completely restored as far south as Medina. It never, of course, reached as far as Mecca. Regular train services are promised in the near future.

Transjordanian Stamps.

Transjordania is, at last, and to signalise in a measure its independence, to issue its own postage stamps. After the occupation it, like Palestine, used the E.E.F. stamps, which, late in 1920, were overprinted with the Arabic words Sharq ul-Urdan (East of Jordan). The new special Transjordanian issue is to have as its design a picture of the Emir Abdullah's winter palace and an Arab mounted on a camel.

The Haifa Congress.

Two days ago the Executive of the Orthodox Arab Christian Congress, held three weeks ago at Haifa, formally presented to the Patriarch of Jerusalem the resolutions which had been adopted by the Congress. These resolutions are thirty in number. The gist of them is a demand for a controlling share in the financial management, and choice of personnel, of the Greek Convent, or "The Fraternity of the Holy Sepulchre." It raises a very difficult question. From the standpoint of the Arab Orthodox laity and the inferior Arab priesthood, it must be galling in the extreme to see all the important ecclesiastical posts, from that of Patriarch downwards, in the possession of non-Arabic-speaking Greek monks, when such Greeks are not only those who are confined to the monasteries and who hold only titular rank, but those having actual pastoral charges, like the Archbishop of Nazareth; and still more galling to see the considerable income of the Patriarchate administered solely by these Greek leaders, and—so the Arab laity assert—administered badly and not by any means to the advantage of the Arab laity, since higher educational facilities and hospitals are entirely absent, and elementary schools are very few and very inefficient. On the other side, the "Hellenic" leaders can rightly urge that they have existed in their present form in Palestine for very many centuries, before the Arab conquest that for many centuries they were almost the only survival of Orthodox Christianity in the Holy Land; that they owed their existence to "Hellenic" support from abroad, and never did, any more than they do now, depend on Palestinian Orthodox support; that the present inability to provide adequate educational, charitable, and pastoral help for the Palestinian Orthodox flock is only a temporary disability, due to the financial stringencies resulting from the War years; and, even so, what help they had been able to hold out to the Orthodox laity was undertaken as a voluntary labour rather than as a primary duty.

It is inevitable that the Thirty Resolutions will not prove acceptable to the Patriarchate, and probably the laity may appeal to the local Government to intervene, as the Turkish Government did fifteen years ago, when this very same dispute last came to a head. The Patriarchate will, however, make an attempt to meet the laity to the extent of consenting to the formation of a mixed (Arab laity and Greek monastic) committee, which shall administer a portion of the Patriarchal revenue earmarked for lay benefits—educational and charitable. This was a compromise arrived at by a Committee of Investigation set up by Turkey shortly before the War, but the mixed committee never, apparently, found opportunity to function, and it has remained a dead letter.

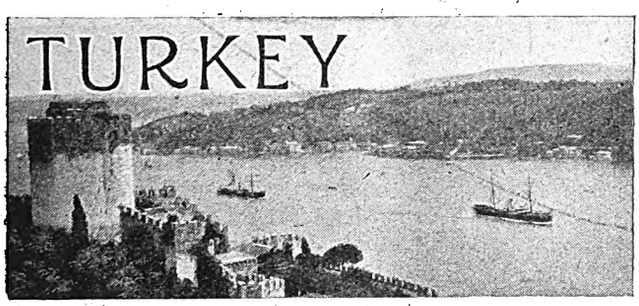
Arabs and the Advisory Council.

The question of the resigned Arab members of the Advisory Council is kept gently simmering. The local Die-Hards have a suspicion that the nominees do not yet look upon their resignation as final, and it is found necessary every now and then to point out the resolution at the Jaffa Congress proclaiming an anathema on any Arab who dares to have any truck with the Council. In spite of this threat, a gentle infiltration of what seem to be "semi-inspired" statements is coming through, via the Egyptian paper Al-Mokattam, to the effect that the "provisionally resigned" nominees feel that they can better serve their country in the Advisory Council than out of it, or that they fear that their final resignation may involve them in the loss of their present positions. The Die-Hards are beginning to feel the absence of moral support from British sources. The Times leader of some time back, and the recent very decisive statements in Parliament from the Under-Secretary of the Colonial Office, have caused it to dawn in their minds that their former wholly negative policy is harming them, and that a local governmental machine may come into being which is content to ignore them completely. There are now a few nervous and tentative efforts in certain sections of the local Arab Press towards sounding public opinion on the advisability of a "moderate" party which, without deviating from the cardinal principles of Palestinian Arab Nationalism, shall yet condescend to treat with the British local Government.



Constantinople, August 14.

The New Order.

The past week has seen the definite orientation of Turkish thoughts away from the past and towards the future, towards the reconstruction of post-War Turkey and the problems of the future which await solution. The return of Ismet Pasha and his principal colleagues from Lausanne, the convocation of the Second National Assembly on August 11, are the principal landmarks. Comments upon both these events show the changed outlook, and the whole country is agog with curiosity as to the new Constitution and the policy of the Government.

It has frequently been pointed out by many competent observers that the overwhelming success of Mustapha Kemal's People's Party at the elections does not necessarily imply that no opposition exists. As a matter of fact, it is becoming increasingly obvious that a very important current of opposition is gathering strength within the ranks of this all-embracing party. Personal jealousies and rivalries are beginning to show up in the light of day. The two senior officers, Noureddin Pasha and Ali Ihsan Pasha, are regarded as acknowledged leaders of the military elements, which, for one reason or another are opposed to the personal ascendancy of Mustapha Kemal. The tour of Hussein Reouf Bey round the country, partly for political purposes and partly for reasons of health, has let loose a flood of rumours concerning his impending nomination to a diplomatic post abroad and his replacement in the Cabinet by Fethi Bey, the present Minister of the Interior. The return of Ismet Pasha, covered with laurels and greeted as the saviour of his country, has almost unconsciously evoked the question: What place is reserved for him in the future scheme of things? We refuse to commit ourselves to definite prophecies; but if the new assembly carries on the tradition of its predecessor by maintaining the personal ascendancy of Mustapha Kemal in one form or another, we venture to predict that means will be found to divert the energies of the more prominent leaders of Nationalist Turkey into channels where they will be less likely to enter into competition with the influences of the Ghazi Pasha.

A Government Programme.

More or less inspired versions of the trend of the Government policy are in circulation as the result of a preliminary party meeting of the People's Party under the presidency of Mustapha Kemal on August 7. At this meeting the statutes of the constitution of the party were distributed, and the president sketched the progress of the National movement since the Congress at Balikesir in 1919. The immediate programme of the party is reported to consist of the following plans: the ratification of the Peace Treaty as soon as possible, the modification of the fundamental law of the Constitution in the direction of one-degree elections for deputies, limitation of the mandate of the Assembly to four years, collective Cabinet responsibility to the Assembly, the institution of a Grand Court to replace the Council of State of the old régime. The Ghazi Pasha is to deliver on his expected election to the Presidency of the Assembly on August 13, a speech, in which he will make reference to these proposed modifications and will foreshadow the introduction of bills dealing with the suppression of brigandage, the general registration of the population, the welfare of Government officials, and the creation of various schools and educational institutions. He is expected to make a pronouncement on the proposals of the Minister of Finance for improved methods of collecting tithes and on various other fiscal reforms; also proposals for the Ministry of Public Works concerning the construction and improvement of railways and roads are expected to take a prominent place in the Government programme.

Passport Formalities.

The opening of the new Assembly has happily coincided with the adoption of a very sensible modification of the rules for the entry of foreigners into Turkey, which had called forth vigorous criticisms from all sources. Henceforward the Government has laid down that the submission to Angora of the names of intending arrivals in Turkey is unnecessary, and the only formality to be observed by the intending visitor is the visa from the Turkish Consulate in his country of residence, and if no Turkish Consulate exists, the fee for the visa will be claimed on arrival at Constantinople. This is a reversion to the original procedure, which has worked quite successfully for many months with the minimum of trouble to all concerned. Certain categories of persons are excluded from these provisions, such as Christian Hellenic subjects, Armenian émigrés from Cilicia and the Eastern Vilayets, certain ex-Ottoman subjects, etc. These provisions do not apply to the subjects of those States which restrict the entry of Turkish subjects into their territories; in such cases reciprocal restrictions will be applied. The question of the unrestricted admission of foreigners into Anatolia is being considered, but until a definite decision is taken the present rules, which prescribe individual reference to Angora, remain in force.

Allied Evacuation.

Preparations for the evacuation of the Allied Forces are going on apace. Conferences between the Allied Generals and Selaheddin Adil, Military Governor of Constantinople, are taking place with the object of fixing all the complicated details of the handing over of buildings, military material, etc. The signature of peace has led to the resumption of official relations between the Turkish and the Allied Armies and the exchange of salutes between detachments. The British Forces are holding their farewell functions, among which the Air Force Pageant at the aerodrome at San Stefano will live long in the minds of those who were fortunate enough to witness it. On a beautiful afternoon last Saturday magnificent exhibitions of formation flying, stunting, air-fighting, bombing, message-dropping, etc., were given by the land section of the R.A.F., assisted by their colleagues of H.M.S. Pegasus and Ark Royal in seaplanes. A very large crowd of naval, military, and civil guests was present at the invitation of Group Captain Fellowes and the R.A.F. officers, who made most liberal and comprehensive arrangements for their comfort and refreshment.

The Angora Assembly.

At the last moment before going to post, telegrams have arrived from Angora describing yesterday's sitting of the Assembly. Ali Fuad Pasha, as provisional President, opened the session at 1.30 p.m., in the presence of a large number of the new deputies, including Ismet Pasha, who had just arrived. As was expected Mustapha Kemal Pasha was elected President and Ali Fuad Pasha Second President. As Vice-Presidents were elected Sabri Bey, first Vice-President and Ismet Pasha second Vice-President. Ismet Pasha had a very cordial welcome, both from the members of the Assembly and from the population of Angora, who turned out in crowds to meet him.

PERSIA.

Teheran, July 12.

The Elections

As mentioned in my last letter the fourth term of the Mejliss expired on June 22, but before its dissolution the Parliament voted several measures. The Prime Minister, Mushir ed Dowleh, presented his programme, which differed little from that of his predecessors, and the principal features were the maintenance of strict neutrality and good relations with all foreign Powers, and the bringing to a close of the elections for the new Mejliss as soon as possible, so that the country may not be without a Parliament longer than is necessary. The scrutiny of the votes for Teheran has not been completed, and very few of the provincial towns have yet returned their representatives. In some places the elections have not proceeded smoothly, as witness Shiraz, where a crowd broke into the polling booth, soaked one of the ballot boxes containing some 400 votes with petrol and set it alight! This will further delay matters there, as a fresh ballot must be taken.

In a leading article the semi-official organ, Iran, states that the counting of the votes has established the fact that from 30 to 40 candidates have put themselves up for election for each of the seats in the Mejliss, and the paper sees in this a sign of the poverty and general misery prevailing throughout the country at the present time, and of the difficulty of finding employment to eke out an existence. The article adds that the whole policy of the country appears to be becoming more and more one of being able to earn one's livelihood.

Government Loans.

One of the Mejliss' last acts before its dissolution was to pass a law authorising the Government to conclude a loan of five million dollars through an American bank, and negotiations for this have been actively proceeding through the Persian Minister at Washington. The proceeds of this loan are to be devoted solely towards payment of expenditure approved by the fourth Mejliss, and it is repayable in eight to fifteen years from the revenues of the Treasury other than the Royalties accruing from the Anglo-Persian Oil Company, which seem to be Persia's most reliable source of income.

This loan is quite independent of the loan of at least ten million dollars which is to be granted to the Persian Government in connection with the concession for the oilfields of the four Northern provinces, with regard to which negotiations are also proceeding in America. It is expected to be granted shortly.

The Mejliss also authorised the Government to negotiate a further loan of thirty-five million dollars through an American bank, or banks, for the development of the riches and mineral resources of the country. No engagement must, however, be entered into by the Government in this connection without previous sanction by the Mejliss.

Shiah Priests from Irak.

Considerable excitement has been caused here this last week by the arrival of some 30 Persian Shiah priests from Mesopotamia at Kermanshah. They left Irak for Persia as a protest against the arrest and deportation by the Irak Government of one of the leading Persian priests at Kerbela.

The occasion has, of course, been seized upon eagerly by the Ulemas here, who have held indignation meetings in the Mosques against this action of the Irak Government, which is naturally attributed to the British authorities in Mesopotamia, who are attacked for thus disregarding the religious feelings of the Moslems. Notes have been exchanged between the Persian Government and the British Legation on the subject, and the Shah has been petitioned to intervene with the British Government on behalf of the exiled priest. Deputations have been sent from the priests and other bodies in the capital to the priests at Kermanshah, and it is hoped that a settlement will shortly be reached enabling the priests to return to Mesopotamia.

The local Press has again burst forth in a frenzy of feeling against the British and their policy in Mesopotamia and Persia, and hostile demonstrations were organised the other day against the British, one outside the Shah's Palace in town, and the other outside the British Legation—both of which were dispersed by the police and military. Feeling is also running high in all provincial towns, portending further trouble should the negotiations not result in the return of the priests to their posts in Mesopotamia.

OBITUARY.

Mohamed Bey Abaza, whose death is announced, was a leading member of the Abaza family. The son of Suliman Pasha Abaza, the trusted friend of Lord Kitchener, and one time head of the family, Mohamed Bey spent his whole career in the Egyptian public service. At a very early age he entered the police under Coles Pasha, and at the time of his death was Deputy Director of State Domains. Both his Egyptian and British chiefs placed the fullest confidence in his administrative ability. Mohamed Bey Abaza possessed all the finer attributes of the pure blood Arab. Though an ardent Nationalist, he never ceased to strive to bring British and Egyptians to a better mutual understanding. He played a great and useful part behind the political scenes, particularly during the past few years.

TURKEY'S FIRST NEED.

An early illustration of the disadvantages of Angora as capital of Turkey has been provided by the inadequate reports of the opening of the new Turkish Assembly. Statements of what Mustapha Kemal Pasha was going to say, circulated, no doubt, by an official Press agency, are fuller than the accounts of what he actually said. When all allowance is made for the remoteness of Angora and the absence of foreign correspondents, there would seem to be some justification for the disappointment felt in the President's speech. He appears to have made no attempt to elaborate the Government's programme, but contented himself with a recapitulation of Turkey's achievements. "National security and the independence of the Government" were for him the most important matters, and he allows it to be inferred that he is still more concerned to discover Turkey's potential enemies, whether abroad or at home, than to devote his talents to her economic and intellectual progress. His remarks seemingly were not addressed only to foreign countries. There was, in any case, sufficient vagueness about them to make them applicable to the Government's political opponents, for it was those who menaced Turkey's internal unity as well as those who might be supposed to have designs upon her integrity that were warned that they would find themselves confronted with the whole force of the nation; in other words, the Turkish Army, efficiently organised for the purpose. A saving clause, it is only fair to add, came at the end: "As long as our rights and national honour are respected we shall reciprocate with a similar spirit; but we have learnt by unhappy experience that the rights of the weak are frequently not respected; consequently we must not omit to make the necessary preparations for any eventualities. Meanwhile we shall certainly aim at entertaining good relations with foreign countries on the principles of mutual respect and friendship."

Not only the tenour of Mustapha Kemal Pasha's speech on this occasion, but also the general attitude of the people suggest that most Turks are overlooking the first great need of the country. It is, we are convinced, that both the Turkish Government and the Turkish people should rid themselves of the obsession that they are still fighting with their backs to the wall against a hostile world. That they should yet be under the spell of this bogey is not altogether unnatural, but they cannot on that account justify the attitude. They must bring themselves to realise that with the signing of the Treaty of Lausanne the hostility of which they were formerly the object, as far as the Great Powers are concerned, is entirely a thing of the past. These Powers may have struggled hard to retain their privileges or to restrict from one motive or another Turkey's freedom of action, but when once they have agreed to a definite Treaty on equal terms there can be no question of an attitude that calls for sabre rattling on the part of Turkey, even if that device were likely to prove as effective as Mustapha Kemal Pasha would have his hearers believe. The Turkish Army is entitled to the nation's admiration and gratitude, but a sense of proportion will be beneficial. Against a Balkan neighbour, the Turkish Army, fighting on its own soil, is never to be despised. There is, however, nothing in its victory over a disunited and dispirited Greece that would justify greater reliance being placed in the future on the upkeep of a big army at a crippling expense than on the guarantee of territorial integrity that membership of the League of Nations provides at no expense at all. Turkey requires at once, and will continue to require for many years to come, all the money on which she can lay hands by means of foreign loans or internal taxation for her economic and cultural development. It would be the height of folly in her case to spend money on the upkeep of an army greater than the maintenance of order and security at home calls for, when by the acceptance without suspicion or reservations of all that membership of the League of Nations entails she can obtain all the safeguards that she needs. Even if the emphasis laid upon an efficient army were merely a rhetorical sop to a predominantly military Assembly, Mustapha Kemal Pasha must be held to have lost a good opportunity of directing the minds of his audience away from past struggles to the constructive policy that the future requires.

The omission was in part supplied, though in the vaguest terms, by the new Prime Minister, Fethi Bey. Among the first problems to engage the Government's attention he placed economic and financial questions and the restoration of security. He informed the Assembly that the prolongation of the War had increased brigandage and rendered certain regions unsafe, and he stated that all the forces of the Government would now be employed to destroy the brigand bands. The eyes of the whole world, he added, were fixed upon Turkey, and the Turks must immediately begin to put into effect the most urgent reforms up to the limits of their financial capacity. Even here we miss the right note. If Turkey is to rely upon herself alone, her achievement will fall very far short of her own expectations. On the other hand, if she will frankly face the position that in the past her thoughts and aptitude have turned exclusively to military pursuits, to the neglect of commerce and industry, and if she will of her own accord invite and accept advice and assistance, then she need have no misgivings as to the ultimate results of her hard-won independence. Again, the first step is to exorcise the distrust of the foreigner or, rather, of foreigners as a whole. It is not suggested that the Turks should place themselves at the mercy of any chance foreign adventurer who presents himself. To obviate this danger, the Government will be well advised to make its own selection of foreign helpers, whose advice can be solicited by the business world in regard to similar appointments of its own. For let there be no mistake. The Turkish people has endured much in the face of foreign aggression; it will not tolerate with the same equanimity the indefinite continuation of its evil plight in peace time. Unless, therefore, there are early signs of material prosperity, the Turk will become a prey to the spirit of unrest that battens on food scarcity and the lack of occupation, with disastrous results to his present leaders. As it is impossible that Turkey should rehabilitate herself quickly enough by her own efforts unaided, the Government should lose no time in seeking foreign assistance and in setting an example of trust in the advice of those for whose selection it accepts responsibility.

THE LAUSANNE TREATY.

By CAPT. W. WEDGWOOD BENN, D.S.O., M.P.

Benjamin Franklin said: "There never was a good war nor a bad peace," and whatever may have been the former hopes and aims of the Allies, there is none who did not hear with relief the news that a peace had been signed at Lausanne.

The most striking feature of the dramatic events which have occurred in the Near East during the last five years is the sharp contrast between power paralysed by dissension and intrigue and weakness growing into strength by steady purpose and a deep emerging national consciousness.

The Sèvres demands (in many respects harsh) represent what the Allies by overwhelming force were able to impose on the Turkish Government in August, 1920. Seven months before that date another document had been signed, backed by nothing but the determination of a tiny people. Little was heard of it at the time; few knew even its terms; and yet to-day the National Pact has triumphed, in nearly every respect, over the Treaty of Sèvres.

The reason is not hard to understand. The policy of the Allies was enfeebled by self-seeking. The policy of the Turk was strengthened by single-mindedness.

Nor were Western differences of recent growth. It was not the Greek retreat which created, though it accentuated, them. The Observer, so long ago as June, 1920, said:—

"M. Briand's indictment of the 'Clemenceau policy' is an ironic, not unfriendly, exposition of the extent to which Britain has profited from the peace, more particularly in the Near East. He reproaches not our, but his own, Government with this fact. He regrets not that there has been bargaining over territories in the market, but that his country has possessed herself of too few pledges and has bargained badly."

It is of no advantage now to recall the nature of the preoccupations (the Franklin-Bouillon negotiations and the campaigns in aid of the White Generals, for instance), which hampered the unity of Allied action. One cannot forget, however, the acute note of tragedy in the story of the Greeks. Sent to Anatolia by the Allies; egged-on but not assisted, openly abandoned by some of their friends, and, finally, only a year ago incited by the British Prime Minister, in a speech which was read as an Order of the Day to the Constantinian troops, the unhappy nation had ultimately to be left to its fate.

In case it should be urged that Mr. Lloyd George's policy of September, 1922, was in the Gladstonian tradition, let me quote this passage:—

"We have never given countenance to single-handed attempts to coerce Turkey. We feel that single-handed attempts to coerce Turkey would probably lead to immediate bloodshed and calamity, with great uncertainty as to the issue. The coercion we recommended was coercion by the united authority of Europe, and we always contended that in the case where the united authority of Europe was brought into action, there was no fear of having to proceed to actual coercion. (Midlothian speeches, November 25, 1879.)

In short, the admission of Turkey into a League of Nations is a real satisfaction of Mr. Gladstone's ideal. How variously, and it is to be hoped effectively, the League enters into the machinery of Turkish Government can be seen by an examination of the Lausanne Treaty. The Pilgrimage Commission, the exchange of populations, the appointment of Conseillers Légistes, and the protection of Minorities are all matters now of direct concern to Geneva.

* * * * * *

Let us for a moment examine the terms of the National Pact and see how far they are fulfilled by the new Treaty.

Article I. declares the right, now being exercised more or less effectually, of the Arab populations to determine their own destiny. It further demands the same right for all territories with an Ottoman Moslem majority. In deference to this demand, the Mosul question is to be settled by special agreement, or, failing that, by the arbitration of the League of Nations.

Article III. asks what has not been granted—a plebiscite in Western Thrace. We may note, however, that the boundary has been adjusted in the Turkish interest.

Article IV. demands the security of Constantinople, and offers what is commonly called the "Freedom of the Straits," an agreement as to which is the subject of a special convention.

Article V. offers to minorities the same measure of protection as is afforded to minorities in enemy countries by the other War Treaties. Except that these guarantees are to some extent strengthened by the special provisions of the Treaty, referred to above, it may be said that this article has been fulfilled. It contains a stipulation for reciprocal treatment which is absolutely just, and no doubt will be complied with.

Article VI., which has been the cause of long delay and much bargaining, may be said also to have been agreed to. It embodies the aspiration for free national and economic development. It rejects "restriction inimical to our development in political, judicial, financial, and other matters."

The Capitulatory rights, first conferred on Englishmen in 1583, disappear, and, subject to a small measure of special protection, the foreigner in Turkey is as the foreigner elsewhere.

In short, the national aims of Angora have been realised. Mustapha Kemal has achieved what he set out to do. The right and, indeed, the only attitude for the Western Powers to assume is one of good will. Turkey will certainly need the practical assistance of European finance and commerce, the more so since she is losing so many elements which in the past have formed the backbone of her trade. It is for her now to prove that she can use wisely her new independence and to create in the breasts of the private individuals whose help is vital to her that confidence without which all the diplomatic instruments in the world are of no value.

According to the Palestine Weekly, M. Ribot, an official of the French Administration in Syria, has been appointed Deputy High Commissioner in the place of M. Robert de Caix, who has returned to France.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Letters intended for publication MUST be accompanied by the writer's full name and address, not necessarily for publication, but as an evidence of good faith. They should be worded as briefly as possible and must be written on one side of the paper.

THE BULGARIAN SITUATION.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—As a regular reader of your esteemed weekly review, I read a letter, published in the issue of July 12, on "The Bulgarian Situation," written by M. P. M. Mattheeff, the mis-statements and misrepresentations of which should not pass unnoticed.

No doubt the worst thing of the recent coup d'état in Bulgaria, my unhappy fatherland, was the extremely cruel murder of the late Bulgarian Premier, M. Stambolisky. M. Mattheeff states: "All hated him as a violent upstart, demagogue, and corrupted tyrant. . . ." This is the language of an ex-Bulgarian diplomat and a good servant of ex-Tsar Ferdinand. From this language of M. Mattheeff one can understand why Bulgaria is now in so unfortunate a situation. When M. Mattheeff states that all hated Stambolisky, he is utterly wrong. Stambolisky was loved by the great majority of the Bulgarian people as no other Bulgarian statesman is loved. He was, however, hated, bitterly hated, by a small sect of people calling themselves intelligentsia.

It is neither my business nor the business of men like M. Mattheeff to speak of the great services which Stambolisky did for Bulgaria—that can be left to the historians.

"Bulgarians, you shall look for me on this and that world," said Stambolisky in his last Parliamentary speech. And the time will come very soon when even his cruel murderers will look for him.

Again, M. Mattheeff states that "Stambolisky's colleagues are under arrest, not because they are dangerous men, but because while in power they passed unconstitutional laws." This statement is not only wholly untrue, but entirely nonsense. I may say that not a single law, of all the valuable and constructive legislation voted by the Agrarian majority in the National Assembly, is unconstitutional. M. Mattheeff may speak idle words, but he cannot give any proof. However, while this talk of passing unconstitutional laws by Stambolisky's colleagues is idle and nonsensical, the imprisonment of Stambolisky's colleagues—the Ministers and the members of the Legislative Chamber—is not only an unprecedented barbarism, but entirely unconstitutional. Thus the Bulgarian Constitution, Art. 93, provides: "Each member of the Assembly has a right to express freely his opinion and to vote according to his own conviction and conscience. Nobody can either question him for expressed opinion or set up against him any persecution."

And yet Art. 96 of the same Constitution says:—"Members of the National Assembly, five days prior to its opening and throughout the session, shall not be imprisoned and tried except in cases when they are accused of crimes for which the criminal law provides capital punishment. In this event, cases for imprisonment shall immediately be reported to the National Assembly, with whose approval only may a representative be sent for trial." These are the provisions of the Bulgarian Constitution. Stambolisky's colleagues, Ministers and representatives, all active members of the Agrarian Party—those of them, that is, who are still alive—and even Stambolisky's sick wife and his eighteen-year-old boy, have been imprisoned because for the Bulgarian revolutionists no Constitution exists, no law, not even a drop of humanity.

These usurpers intend to get rid of the powerful Agrarian organisation. They are killing or imprisoning all Agrarian leaders. They intend to try within two days, according to the order of the new Minister of Justice, most of those good Bulgarians whose sin is that they happened to be members of the Agrarian Party.

That is the real situation of volcanised Bulgaria. What will happen, Heaven alone knows.—I am, etc.,

Theo. Geshkoff,
Ex-Under-Secretary of the Agrarian Party.

ARMENIA AND THE LEAGUE.

To the Editor of The Near East.

Sir,—In your issue of August 9 you publish an appeal sent by the Joint Council of British Armenian Societies to Lord Curzon, asking him to bring to the notice of the League of Nations the unhappy condition of the Armenian refugees, with a view to obtaining for them a solution which may enable them to enjoy a reasonable measure of security and happiness.

In the interest of the Armenians themselves, I sincerely hope there is no idea of making Turkey's membership of the League, to which reference is made in the appeal, conditional upon her acquiescence in the return of these unfortunate people, nor when she has become a member of using the machinery of the League for this purpose.

After the determined way in which Turkey refused at Lausanne to submit to outside interference in what she considers a domestic affair, any fresh attempt by the League of Nations is foredoomed to failure. The only result would be to make the Turks suspicious of the League and indefinitely postpone any chance of their allowing these victims of European meddling to return.

The Turks know that many of the members of these British Armenian organisations actively encouraged in the past the separatist aspirations of their Armenian subjects, and they fear they will do so again should the refugees return to their homes.

The dissolution of these societies would, therefore, be more likely to assist their protégés than this appeal to Lord Curzon for intervention by the League of Nations. It is this continued threat of outside interference which ruins any chance of the Turks and Armenians settling this matter amicably between themselves. The Armenians realise this, and are already asking to be saved from their friends. If they are left alone there is no reason why the Armenians should not again become the "millet-i-sadiki"—contented people—they were until 1878, when their loyalty was first undermined by Russian intrigue.—I am, etc.,

C. F. Dixon-Johnson.

SERBIAN LIBRARIES.

It is stated that since the South Slav Entente Committee was registered, in January, 1919, as a war charity "to undertake the reconstruction of the libraries of Serbia," over 18,000 books have been sent to Belgrade. These include an adequate collection of all classes of English literature, as well as works of reference. Since 1919 the funds raised by the committee amount to £136, of which £107 has been expended on the carriage and packing of books. The committee has received the thanks of the Rector of the University of Belgrade, of the Minister of Education, and of the Yugoslav Government.

PALESTINE.

"PALESTINE: THE LAND OF THREE FAITHS." By Philip Graves (London: Jonathan Cape. 12s. 6d. net.)

Of all the many problems to which the War gave rise, there is none which has aroused more passion, greater display of ignorance, and larger need for self-control and an ability to see things steadily than that of Palestine. By the ordinary man the problem is solved by the application of prejudice—either his own or that of the proprietor of his favourite newspaper. But to the intelligent student Palestine presents a most difficult question, extended study of which often seems to create more hopeless bewilderment.

It is to the rescue of this serious student that Mr. Philip Graves has now come, and few writers could have come with more obvious qualifications for enlightening. Not only is Mr. Graves extraordinarily well informed, not only has he vast experience of this problem of Palestine, but he has balance, a nice sense generally of proportion, and a sturdy serenity which permits him to hope that the best may yet come out of the second-best. We—that is, the British Government—have messed the problem; we have encouraged and disappointed both Jew and Arab; we are as yet completely trusted by neither; but, by dint of rigid perseverance and unswerving honesty, we may, Mr. Graves thinks, right the matter.

The author begins by getting the picture in correct perspective with a slight historical sketch of the Holy Land up to 1914. From this he proceeds to the core of the problem. He examines the reaction of the War upon Zionism, recounts the history of the Balfour Declaration, and proves, incidentally, to his own satisfaction, that the agreement which Sir Henry McMahon made with King Hussein was not conflicted by that Declaration. On this count, it may be that Mr. Graves derives an unimportant and sterile satisfaction, because, as Dr. Hogarth says in his extremely sensible Introduction, whatever the letter of the Agreement may mean, the spirit in which we preached Nationalism to the Arabs was decidedly in conflict with the promises held out to the Zionists.

Mr. Graves goes on to expound the position of the Arabs in Palestine, the nature and the justification of their opposition both to Zionist claims and to the supposed dangers of the British Administration. He describes lucidly the impossible extremism both of Jew and of Arab, the division and sects into which both races are divided, and the moderate elements in each. Some of the details which he supplies of Zionist difficulties may be a little superfluous, as also the pages which he devotes to the forgery (as he considers it) of the famous "Protocols," but, apart from these two things, his exposition is throughout admirably useful.

The conclusion which Mr. Graves reaches after going in and out and round and about the question is that, not only must Great Britain hold Palestine in military interests, for very certainly either France, or Italy, or Turkey would step in where we feared to remain, but she must resist the cry for evacuation or lose all her name for political honesty—a loss that would be experienced not in the East alone, but also among American Jewry. And there is both a moderate Zionist and Arab attitude that we can honourably support.

This is a sensible, yet optimistic, conclusion. How optimistic it is can be realised by setting down the question which so experienced an observer as Dr. Hogarth asks—he has just referred to our interpretation of the Balfour Declaration as "depreciated currency" for the Zionists—"If it should fall yet a point or two—by further diminution, for example, of the status and powers of the Jewish Council—will it be marketable at all?" Mr. Graves' answer is vague but comprehensive enough: we must plod on, patiently and perseveringly, "for that Semitic synthesis in the Holy Land in which the Jew will play the part to which his most Jewish leaders aspire—the part of intermediary and perhaps one day of mediator between West and East."

The book has sixteen excellent illustrations, a map, and four valuable appendices, but it suffers from absence of any index, and, in lesser degree, from slackness of punctuation. In consideration of its great and urgent informative value, it is to be hoped that the next edition will at least be provided with an index.

THREE NOVELS.

"THE ROAD TO DELHI." By R. J. Minney. (London: The Bodley Head. 7s. 6d. net.)

"THE KEY OF DREAMS." By L. Adams Beck. (London: Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)

"THE AMBER GIRL." By Clarice Mayne and R. Thurston Hopkins. (London: Cecil Palmer. 3s. 6d. net.)

In "Maki" Mr. Minney told the story of a native girl; in his latest novel he writes about a boy. Motihari begins his career at a very early age by being lost on the Grand Trunk Road, where he is knocked down by the car of an American business man from Calcutta, who befriends him. In time he loses this protection, and after several adventures, is educated at school and college in Calcutta during the War. He joins the followers of Ghandi, and amongst them meets and falls in love with a Bengali girl of fine character, who has been educated at the same college.

The sight of his former American benefactor hurt in a riot changes his outlook. He feels a horror of the futility of violence, to which many unscrupulous followers of Ghandi are using every means to incite the people, and of any attempt to change the Government of India, when so much reform in the lives and customs of the people themselves is needed. He preaches his belief in many villages. Finally, at the time of the Prince of Wales's visit to Calcutta, a magnificent act of sacrifice on his part is rewarded, and all ends happily.

Mr. Minney absolutely convinces us that he knows what he is writing about. The India that he shows us is known and understood, and is not the India of careless superficial observation or of literary convention. Motihari's adventure among the beggars is powerfully bold. The crescent-shaped man of the Street of the Goldsmiths is the result of a true creative imagination—a horrible figure who remains in the memory. This story should be read with interest as a finely conceived picture of some features of life in India, especially as it is affected by present problems.

Lance Dunbar, the hero of Mr. Beck's novel, is in the end converted to Buddhism, and the whole story is coloured by enthusiasm for this religion. This gives the reader the slightly aggravated feeling produced by any novel which is in part a work of propaganda. But this feeling is counteracted by the fact that the author is able to convey to us his own deep sense of beauty, both spiritual and physical, for which we cannot but be grateful. Lovely things seen in Japan, China, and Java are sketched delicately but clearly. We feel acutely all that is beautiful in Miyuki, Lance's mistress—half Japanese and half English—in spite of her final treachery. Mr. Beck is not so successful with the Englishwoman with whom Lance finds real happiness and who shares with him his spiritual discoveries. She is the wronged but noble wife of a dissolute husband, and is sometimes rather more holy than human. She, Miyuki, and Haridas, the Buddhist monk from whom Lance learns wisdom, all come into his life after he has inherited the fortune of his cousin of the same name as himself, with whose life they have all been connected. We are given to understand that the dead Lance is fulfilling his own destiny, his earthly career having been cut short by the War, through his cousin. This idea is skilfully carried out, and is not over-elaborated. "The Key of Dreams" is evidently written with sincerity, and has touches of exquisite and unusual beauty.

Rossetta, "the amber girl," is a Persian who has "a long oval face of a wondrous transparent olive tint. A prominent brow and arched delicate eyebrows fitly surmounted a nose smoothly aquiline, but with broad, well-set nostrils that bespoke fortitude, coquetry, and Eastern passion." She is married to Tarvil, a Turkish "super-spy," and leader of insurrection in Egypt, about whom "rested an atmosphere of horror, peculiar, unique. He was not as other men." She loves and, after her husband is murdered, marries Godfrey Braddon, of the British Secret Service. The episodes which lead up to this end are feeble in themselves, and held together by the slackest of threads. All the chief characters repeatedly quote from "Omar Khayyam" and refer to the "Arabian Nights." We had hopes at the beginning that this book was perhaps written as a parody of the all-too-many novels that deal with the "passion," the "mystery," and the "colour" of the East. This hope abandoned, we were merely left bewildered by so much silliness.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London,
Tuesday Morning.

The Situation.

There seems no question that the British Note to the Allies, despite the criticisms that have been levelled at it from various quarters, has done much to clarify the position; and during the last few days it is not an exaggeration to say that something akin to a hopeful feeling has sprung up that out of this exchange of views the way to a settlement will be found. The reception of the Note in France was unfavourable outwardly at first, but there appears to have been a distinct change in sentiment, and possibly inspired comments on M. Poincaré's reply, which will have arrived before these notes appear, suggest that it will be distinctly conciliatory in tone. It would be very surprising were it otherwise, for even if our Ally is not at the moment directly affected as we are by the Ruhr occupation, it is sufficiently obvious that it is as much in France's interest as in that of this country to have a settlement which will enable the Allies to concentrate on economic development.

Reparations.

Fortunately, on the one essential point, that Germany must pay Reparations to the utmost extent consistent with her capacity to do so, there is no disagreement, the only difference being in respect of the method of determining her resources. It should not be a very difficult matter for the Allies to come to an understanding on this point, and on the method of enforcing payment. It needs no demonstration that were Germany to be let off lightly it would be a most disastrous thing for this country and for our Allies. What it would mean would be that while we are handicapped with the heavy burden of the American debt, which, of course, is in effect a tax on our export trade, Germany would be suffering from no such embarrassment, and would, in consequence, be able to compete against us to great advantage in the world markets. In fact, as far as we are concerned, there would be no competition, for the conditions would give the trade to Germany, and in doing so would give the historians ample scope for essays in future schoolbooks on the advantage of losing a war.

This Year's Crops.

It is a strange commentary on the prevailing economic conditions that Nature's kindness in regard to this year's harvest should not have been altogether an unmixed blessing. Nearly every country is able to report satisfactory crops. In the Near East, for instance, the yield generally is expected to be good, great grain-producing centres like Canada are rejoicing in the promise of a bumper harvest, while there is talk of considerable export from Russia, and, indeed, I understand that a certain amount of grain-chartering business has been put through for the Black Sea ports. In the circumstances one would naturally assume that the harvest would have an immediate and most beneficial influence on the recovery of a war-distressed world. Unfortunately, this is not likely to be the case, for the value of an abundant surplus of grain lies in the certainty of markets for it, and buyers at the present time are in a minority. Europe will not be importing much grain this year because its crops are good, and the obvious consequence will be that other importing centres will naturally have to pay less for their requirements. In other words, prices will fall. America will be somewhat seriously affected, and Canada also to some extent, but the main incidence will fall on the country with the strongest exchange, while the Near Eastern countries will suffer (those, that is, who are able to export to any considerable degree) by not obtaining the prices they could reasonably have expected to obtain.

Sudan Trade Improving.

The figures for the trade of the Sudan for the first five months of the year show a marked improvement compared with the statistics for the corresponding period of the previous year, and it is worth noting that the improvement is most marked as regards exports. The imports amounted in value to £E1,747,750 and the exports to £E1,310,270, there being increases respectively of £E82,766 and £E397,846. Egypt and Great Britain between them were responsible for more than two-thirds of the import trade of the Sudan, the figures for Egypt being £E651,936 and for Great Britain £E558,582. Specially noteworthy in the list of imports is the great increase in cotton piece goods, which amounted in value to £E414,619, as compared with £E297,734 in 1922. As regards exports, there was a marked increase in the trade in grain 12,240 tons were exported in the five months, as compared with 8,274 tons, the respective values being £E569,511 and £E279,759. On the other hand, the export of ginned cotton was about the same as in 1922, though the value was somewhat higher. This is, of course, the feature on which the Sudan will have to depend to rectify its adverse trade balance, and from now onwards this item should make its presence increasingly felt in the trade balance-sheet.

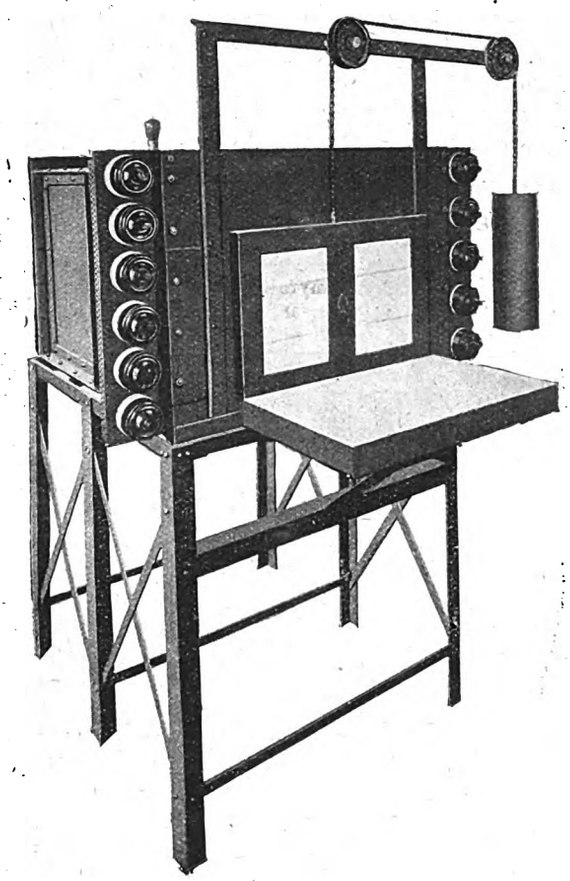
Internally Heated Electric Furnaces.

I only dealt very briefly last week with a new type of electric furnace, and I propose now to amplify what I then said on the subject. For a variety of reasons, notably the ease and certainty of heat control, electric furnaces have come to enjoy a very marked degree of popularity, and a demand has for some time existed for a larger furnace than has hitherto been available. For a considerable period Messrs. the Automatic and Electric Furnaces, Ltd., have been conducting experiments with a view to producing a furnace that would meet requirements, and the new type of



The Wild Barfield Internally-Heated Furnace.

Wild Barfield internally-heated furnace (an illustration of which is given on this page) marks their success in overcoming a number of technical difficulties that stood in the way of their production of the larger type.

This furnace is constructed on the unit principle, its walls, floor, and roof being composed of bricks 4 in. by 4in., which dovetail into one another, and have on the inside face three grooves which form regular lines when the bricks are fitted together and in which are placed the heating wires. As will be seen from the second illustration, the grooves are so designed that the heating units cannot come into contact with the material in the furnace. The furnace, which is constructed so as to reduce the loss of heat to a minimum, has an outside casing of boiler-plate, which is strengthened by angle-iron, while the door is constructed of firebricks. As I mentioned last week, it is possible to obtain a temperature of 800 degrees C. in an hour, while another 200 degrees C. can be obtained in roughly 1½ hours.

The Shipping Exhibition.

We are nearing the end of the close season as far as exhibitions are concerned, and the last day of this month will see the opening at Olympia of the Shipping, Engineering and Machinery Exhibition. This promises to be a very notable undertaking, and should give a much-needed stimulus to British trade, as it is understood that hundreds of overseas representatives of Admiralties, harbour authorities, railways, shipping companies, and engineering construction will be present. The exhibition will be of a very comprehensive character, as apart from the machinery exhibits, such as cranes, elevators, semi-Diesel marine engines, and motor-boat, marine and stationary internal combustion engines, the exhibits will include the latest developments in the application of gas and electricity to small businesses, the latest methods of fuel saving, various new signalling, burglar, and fire alarms, interchangeable signs, and hundreds of other appliances, and as many of them will be seen at work it is evident that the exhibition will make a wide appeal to the general public as well as to the business man. It is worthy of note en passant, as an indication of the enterprise of the organisers of the exhibition, that their latest bulletin, giving detailed particulars of the exhibits, which has just reached me, is printed in three languages—English, French, and Spanish.

Some Exhibits.

A few notes on some of the outstanding exhibits may be of interest. Messrs. W. H. Dorman and Co., Ltd., will be showing a comprehensive range of wave power plant, including a self-propelled three-drill wave power plant, designed for public works, etc., and a three-drill wave power generator mounted on a trolley to suit a narrow gauge track. The "Boulton" patent water elevator will be shown by Messrs. Boulton and Paul, Ltd. This elevator, which can be utilised for any depth up to 300 feet, is designed to supersede the old-fashioned deep water pump. A "Ransome" electric runabout crane, electric industrial pumps, and "Ransome" continuous current electric motors will be features of the stand of Messrs. Ransomes, Sims and Jefferies, Ltd. At the stand of Messrs. Parsons Marine Steam Turbine Co., Ltd., a working model of Parsons' Turbines working in conjunction with Parsons' double reduction gearing will be exhibited. A hydraulic tyre press for removing and fixing the solid rubber tyres of commercial vehicles will be shown by Messrs.

Hollings and Guest, Ltd., whose other exhibits will include a bending press for bending plates cold up to 6 ft. in width. Messrs. George Kent, Ltd., will be showing a large variety of meters and valves, while another interesting stand in what may be called the general section of the exhibition will be that of Messrs. The Aerograph Co., Ltd., who will demonstrate the Aerograph system of utilising compressed air for the application of paints, varnishes, etc. Besides the exhibitors in this section that I have mentioned, there are a whole host of others whose exhibits will be of an important character, and I shall hope to be able to refer to at least a few of these when the time comes to review the exhibition.

The section devoted to motor-boat, marine, and stationary internal combustion engines and accessories also promises to be very interesting. Messrs. the Ailsa Craig Motor Co., Limited, will be showing their fast runabout launch, a standard work boat, and a number of types of marine motors. Another notable stand will be that of Messrs. the Parsons Motor Co., Ltd., whose exhibits will include a standard 28 h.p. type Parsons engine, a standard 42 h.p. type Parsons marine set for kerosene fuel, and a standard 60 h.p. type Parsons marine set for kerosene fuel.

Athens, August 4.

The total number of ships which entered the port of Piræus during July was 550. Of these 431 were Greek, 45 Italian, 26 British, 8 Dutch, 8 French, 7 German, 6 Roumanian, 4 Swedish, 4 Norwegian, 3 American, 2 Danish, 2 Bulgarian, 1 Yugoslavian, 1 Russian, 1 Belgian, and 1 Japanese. The number of sailing vessels which entered the port during the same period was 682, of which 11 were Italian.

The receipts of the Piræus Customs during the month of July amounted to 25,431,931.10 paper drs. and 143,320 drs. in gold, as against 13,645,289.60 paper drachmæ collected during the corresponding month last year.

A RIVER LAUNCH FOR INDIA.

Light craft are constantly in demand for India, judging from the records of builders of these types of vessels. For instance, a 35-ft. river launch has been recently completed and shipped to India to the order of H.H. Maharana Sir Fateh Singh by Messrs. John I. Thornycroft and Co., Ltd. This craft is a typical example of the embodiment of materials, workmanship, and finish of the highest class, which, it will be appreciated, would be expected in a pleasure launch of this nature. Accommodation for passengers is arranged in a forward well, upholstered damask portable chairs, and athwartship seats being provided, whilst the after well is for the use of the steersman and any extra hands that may be carried.

The engine installed is a Thornycroft A.B./4 type, developing 30 b.h.p. on petrol, and is enclosed in a teak casing with removable side panels and glass top panels. With this equipment a speed of over 11 knots is attained. The hull construction is of double-skin teak, copper sheathed to above the water line.

THE TURKISH TOBACCO TRADE.

An interesting little manual by Mr. T. Constantinides on "Handling and Blending Turkish Tobacco" has recently been published, containing, with certain additions, a series of articles that have appeared in Tobacco. The writer aims at bringing about the adoption of a fixed code for the grading and classifying of Turkish tobacco with a view to facilitating the trade in this commodity, and advocates certain codes and systems as being best calculated, in his opinion, to meet the obvious need. In the preface he explains that those he has set forth "have been so adapted to combine the best of those which have come within the extensive purview of the writer," while having sufficient originality of their own.

It must be a very moot point whether Turkish tobacco will ever be a serious competitor in this country with the Virginian leaf, for the British taste differs from that of the Continental, and whatever else it is it is essentially conservative. But in this country, as elsewhere, the Turkish tobacco industry has an immense leeway to make up to regain its pre-war position, and this can obviously only be accomplished by the most scrupulous attention to the preparation of the leaf. The emphasis laid by Mr. Constantinides on the importance of this point, and his careful and painstaking survey of the industry, render the manual of extreme value, and there can be no question that in undertaking and accomplishing the work he has done a great service to the trade.

ROUMANIAN TRADE DEBTS.

The London Chamber of Commerce state that the publication has been officially authorised of the following statement regarding the Roumanian law for the settlement of private debts contracted in currency of superior quotation, namely:

"The law promulgated on June 2 is a law with a general character which regulates payments in foreign currency so far as a collective convention between any group of foreign creditors and Roumanian debtors may not have been passed and ratified by the Roumanian Government.

"Consequently, if there is any difference between the above-mentioned general law and the British conventions of February 15 and March 9, these conventions —so far as concerns British creditors only —will naturally prevail over the general law.

"This was always the intention of the Roumanian Government. In order to avoid all misunderstandings, this principle will be once more affirmed by a law which will be passed immediately after the opening of the Roumanian Parliament in November, 1923.

"An arrangement of the question of the pre-war debts owing to British creditors will be negotiated between the British creditors and Roumanian debtors in accordance with paragraphs 1 and 2 of the convention concluded with British creditors.

"In pursuance of the provisions of the above-mentioned law to the effect that it will be applied in the spirit of British conventions, a regulation elaborated by the 'office of payments in foreign currency' will declare the law immediately enforceable in favour of British creditors in accordance with their conventions of February 15 and March 9, 1923."

YUGOSLAV TOBACCO PRODUCTION.

The Commercial Secretary at Belgrade has informed the Department of Overseas Trade that it is confidently anticipated that the tobacco harvest will be a considerable improvement on the figures for last year, when the production was comparatively poor, and fell below the requirements of the country, necessitating the importation from Holland of commoner tobaccos in addition to the finer qualities usually imported. The production for last year amounted to 9,781,443 kilogrammes, whilst the annual consumption in this country is not less than 20,000,000 kilogrammes.

In view of the shortage of tobacco last year the Monopoly Administration decided this year to raise the prices paid to producers. This has had the effect of extending the interest in tobacco-growing, which in the past has been regarded as an unprofitable industry. In accordance with this decision the prices paid to the producers has been increased by 200 per cent., and in some parts by as much as 300 per cent. As a consequence of this incentive to the growers, almost double the area has been sown with tobacco this year, which, together with a sufficient rainfall, gives hopes of a very satisfactory tobacco crop.

On the basis of reports already received, the Monopoly Administration estimate the production as follows (in kilogrammes):—Southern Serbia, 6,219,492; Northern Serbia, 3,190,802; Montenegro, 179,549; Vojvodina, 4,363,827; Bosnia, 990,692; Herzegovina, 3,622,938; Dalmatia, 1,619,186; Croatia and Slavonia, 445,325; Slovenia, 125,938; total, 20,757,749.

ADVANCE IN IVORY PRICES.

Messrs. Hale and Son, in their report on the quarterly ivory sales held in July, state:—

The quarterly ivory sales commenced on the 24th and concluded on the 25th inst. They comprised 32½ tons (against 41¼ tons same time last year), viz., 12¼ tons Zanzibar, Bombay, Mozambique, East African, and Siam; ¾ ton Abyssinian, 10¾ tons Egyptian (Alexandrian description), 7¾ tons West Coast and Central African; ¾ ton Lisbon, and ¼ ton land carriage; also ¼ ton rhinoceros horns, sea-horse tusks, etc. Total, 32¾ tons.

The Egyptian consisted entirely of the Alexandrian description, there being no Malta catalogued. The East Indian and East African descriptions consisted of 7¾ tons soft tusks, ¼ ton hard and few Siam, 1 ton billiard ball pieces, ¼ ton bagatelle ditto, ¼ ton billiard ball scrivelloes and few bagatelle, ½ ton cut points for balls, ½ ton cut points off large tusks, ¼ ton under-size and defective points, and few centres, 1 ton cut hollows, ¼ ton scrivelloes, and ¼ ton mixed defective pieces, etc.

Of the above quantities the whole was new import with the exception of ¾ ton—viz., ½ ton East Indian and ¼ ton Egyptian. The whole quantity offered was sold. The quantity catalogued of all descriptions was small. There was a good attendance of buyers and a good demand, the competition being well maintained. America, the Continent, and home trade all bought freely. There was again a good advance in prices, soft tusks being £15 to £20 per cwt. higher, and hard £8 to £12 per cwt. dearer. Billiard ball pieces were well competed for and advanced £12 to £15 per cwt. on the average, some sizes bringing extreme prices.

Abyssinian.—The small quantity offered sold as other soft descriptions.

Egyptian.—Soft large and medium tusks were £15 to £20 per cwt. higher, and hard £8 to £12 per cwt. dearer. Scrivelloes £2 to £4 per cwt. higher. Billiard ball scrivelloes were irregular, and on the whole brought about last sales' prices. Soft bangle tusks advanced £10 to £20 per cwt., and hard £5 to £10 per cwt.

BULGARIAN MARKET REVIVING.

The Bulgarska Banka, in its report dated August 1, states:—

There is a slight improvement in the commercial situation. Money is becoming less scarce, and credits have been accorded to firms of good standing with considerable caution. Cotton thread, cabots and, in general, products imported and intended for local consumption, have been actively sold during the month. The harvest is considered good. It is very probable that the first transactions in grain will take place shortly. In general the depression has affected all branches of commerce. The bitter lessons of these latter times have made dealers very cautious in their transactions. If this attitude is maintained, the situation will become healthy before the end of the year.

As regards exports, the tobacco trade is at a standstill, but the preparation of tobacco sold previously continues. Transactions in cocoons have been effected round about 300-325 leva. For the moment business is dull, but there will be an improvement towards August 15, when the cocoons will be quite dry. The rose crop this year did not exceed 1,200 kgrs. The gathering of flowers commenced on May 25 and ended on June 13. On an average the yield has been 100 kgrs. of flowers per decaire.

SUDAN GUM TRADE.

Record Arrivals at El Obeid.

The report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government for June gives the following particulars:—

The exports of gum during June were as follows:—Via Port Sudan, 51,800 kilos of bleached of the value of £E3,068, 1,019,907 kilos of hashab of the value of £E50,575, and 141,305 kilos of talh (including 20,137 kilos of gum dust) of the value of £E3,035; and via Halfa 8,104 kilos of hashab of the value of £E402.

Kordofan Province.—26,055 kantars were sold in El Obeid market during the month of June, as against 14,510 kantars during the same month last year. The average price was £E1.257 per kantar. The arrivals at El Obeid from Nahud were 5,792 kantars, as against 8,403 kantars last year. The amount sold at Nahud during the month was 6,846 kantars, as against 8,174 kantars last year, the average price being £1.030 per kantar. 822 kantars were sold at Um Ruaba at an average price of £1.150 the kantar, as against 804 kantars last year. At Rahad 66 kantars were sold at prices ranging from 650 m/ms. to £1.400, as against 94 kantars during June last year.

El Obeid Market Report.

June.—There were 2,094 lots auctioned during the month. Gum continued to arrive from distant parts of the province, as is shown by the large number of camel loads which arrived as compared with bull and donkey loads—viz., 6,320 camel loads, 736 donkey loads, and 5 bull loads. The highest price paid was P.T. 147 per kantar of 100 rottles and the lowest P.T. 120, the average price being P.T. 125. Daily fluctuation in price averaged P.T. 6, and the highest fluctuation in one day was P.T. 16, which was due to purchase of slightly damaged gum. Prices were steady in the early part of the month, rose to 147 P.T. in the middle, but fell to P.T. 127 by the end of the month. The total amount of gum sold was 26,055 kantars, an average of 1,085 kantars per day. Total price paid was £E32,759.567 m/ms. Never since the El-Obeid market gum was established has there been so much gum brought in. Arrivals for the month constitute a record for the market.

CROPS IN ALEPPO DISTRICT.

The Acting British Consul at Aleppo, in forwarding to the Department of Overseas Trade the following information concerning the present year's harvest, adds that little is available for export.

Wheat is an average crop. Each chomboul (100 kilos) sown has produced eight-fold. The total crop is estimated to amount to 150,000 chombouls (i.e., 15,000 tons). The market price varies between 275 and 325 Turkish silver piatres per chomboul.

Barley is also an average crop. Each chomboul (85 kilos) sown has produced ten-fold. The total crop is estimated at 170,000 chombouls (i.e., 14,450 tons). The market price varies between 120 and 130 Turkish silver piastres per chomboul.

Rye is poor. Each chomboul (100 kilos) sown only produced two-fold. The crop is estimated at 20/25,000 chombouls (i.e., 2/2,500 tons).

Anglo-Egyptian Oilfields.—Production for the week to August 17:—Gemsah, 25 tons; Hurghada, 2,774 tons.

Sir Edwin F. Stockton, M.P., chairman and governing director of Abbott and Stockton, Ltd., Manchester, and a director of the London Midland and Scottish Railway, has been elected to the board of Lloyds Bank.

THE TRANSYLVANIAN HARVEST.

H.M. Consul at Cluj (Mr. C. Goodwin) has forwarded to the Department of Overseas Trade the following crop report for Transylvania, based on information published in the organ of the Transylvanian Agricultural Society:—

Harvesting of wheat and rye, which is completed in the plain, is still in progress in the hilly districts. For winter wheat the average yield is estimated at 8-10 quintals per hectare, for rye at 10 quintals. Spring wheat, which did not develop satisfactorily, improved slightly after late rains, but the average yield is not expected to exceed 7 quintals per hectare.

Harvesting of winter barley is completed. The estimated average yield is 14 quintals per hectare. Spring barley, which was light and sparse owing to insufficient rain, also improved slightly towards the end, especially in the hilly districts. The average yield will, however, hardly exceed 7 quintals per hectare.

Oats have improved considerably after recent rains, and a fair crop is expected. Maize is very irregular. Flax and hemp are medium. Sugar-beet and mangel-wurzel are good. Potatoes are very good. The meadows and pastures are quite satisfactory in some districts and bad in others.

The prospects of the vineyards are very good.

The British Vice-Consul at Timisoara gives the following information regarding the crops in the Banat:—

Rape seed is an average crop. The estimated total yield is 14,000 quintals. The area under wheat was smaller than last year. On the whole, the crop may be said to be a good one, especially in those parts which are inhabited by Suabians, where the yield per hectare was 17-21 quintals. In others it was 9-13, so that the average should be about 12-14 quintals per hectare. The quality was excellent, the weight of a hectolitre varying from 78-82 kilogrammes. It is is also satisfactory to note that the wheat is free from impurities, and that it was only affected by rust in certain districts where the land was not properly cultivated.

Barley gave a very good crop. The average is estimated at 14-16 quintals per hectare. Very little rye was sown in the Banat. The average yield is 12 quintals per hectare. Oats are a bad crop owing to insufficient rain. The average yield is estimated at 7 quintals per hectare. Maize did not develop satisfactorily owing to the drought. The prospects are not very good.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Active and Firm.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ended August 10, state :—

Since our last report the futures market has been fairly active, and the advance secured during the preceding week has been well maintained. The reasons of this week's firmness are the strong recovery in the American markets and the fact that the Egyptian Government have to-day started their purchases in the spot market, paying $31 for fully good fair and $32 for fully good fair to good Sakellarides cotton. The rectification of the Egyptian stock in Liverpool, reported in our last week's report, is not correct, but through no fault of ours. Mail advices report that this reduction was only 6,000 B/s. The difference between November Sakel and October Ashmouni was pushed up at one time during the week to over $5, but it has been again brought down to $4.80. The demand from abroad has been slightly more active, but remains still rather moderate.

This week's receipts amounted to 1,579 krs., and the total since September 1 now stands at 6,635,454 krs. Exports have this week amounted to 69,894 krs., and the stock now stands at 951,719 krs., against 1,020,034 krs. a week ago and 1,560,444 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—Demand from spinners continues poor, and we have had still another quiet week at Minet-el-Bassal. Sales amount to about 3,500 B/s, of which we estimate 1950 Sakel, 1,400 B/s Uppers, and 150 B/s Brown. This total includes about 450 B/s of Sakel, fully good fair and fully good fair to good, bought to-day by the Egyptian Government, following their last week's decision to intervene in the cotton spot market.

Sakellarides.—All styles have been dealt in with the better grades in most request. Prices of spot against contracts are somewhat easier, especially in the lower grades.

Uppers.—The majority of the demand has been for good grades, the lower styles being in poor request. Spot prices against contracts are firm for the better grades, but easier for the lower qualities. Good is for the moment very scarce, though fully good is still to be found; but this situation should be very shortly eased by the arrival of new crops.

White is neglected and quotations of spot are easier.

Brown.—A fair business has been done to-day, but quotations of spot are generally easier.

The Crop.

The weather has been fairly favourable to the plants. Complaints of deficient fruiting of Sakellarides plants are being received from various districts in Lower Egypt. The pink boll worm attack has at present about the same intensity as at the same period last year. One or two ginning factories in Upper Egypt have started work. The first arrivals of new crop cotton are expected next week.

The report of the Ministry of Agriculture on the condition of the cotton crop for the month of July reads as follows :—

In the system of notation employed, 100 is taken to represent an average condition of the crop reported on in each division of the country; this average is calculated from the crop results of the preceding ten years. The figures given below represent forecasts of the final condition of the cotton crop; they are liable to modification in future bulletins in the event of the occurrence of factors influencing the present crop prospects :—Percentage of normal average yield : Lower Egypt, 85; Middle Egypt, 90; Upper Egypt, 102; average whole of Egypt, 87. Estimated average yield (forecast): Lower Egypt, 3.08; Middle Egypt, 3.48; Upper Egypt, 4.94; average whole of Egypt, 3.22.

In Lower Egypt the weather conditions were such as to tend to produce more vegetative growth of the plants rather than the boll-formation. This was especially marked in Sakellarides. In Middle and Upper Egypt the condition of the crop is fairly satisfactory, having slightly improved in certain provinces since last month. Complaints of shortage of water, owing to irrigation of sharaqi lands, were received from a very few localities situated at tail ends of canals. The attacks of cotton worm were mild. Pink boll worm attacks are reported from all districts, but it is too early to forecast the probable degree of the attack. Slight attacks of wilt have also been reported.

The Southern Punjab Railway Company has declared an interim dividend of £5 per cent. on the ordinary stock, subject to English tax at 2s. 11d. in £, payable September 12.

SUDAN COTTON-GROWING.

The Gezira Scheme.

The following particulars are taken from the report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government for June :—

Berber Province.—Pumping station yields 1922-1923 season (in kantars, the figures in brackets showing the average yield per feddan): Mikeilab, 1,158 (3.94); Gendettu, 1,656 (2.68); Bouga, 1,965 (4.68). Gendettu return is the lowest on record. Delay in sowing resulted in the young plants being smothered in grass which sprang up after more than normal rains. The cotton only reached maturity after the cold weather had started, when growth was checked and boll-worm multiplied. Assal and White fly in February and March contributed to the low return. In addition, it is almost certain that no little of the pumping scheme cotton was received from Gendettu and handed in as Sakia cotton.

Dongola Province.—Ghaba Pumping Station report for May: Six kantars were received during the month, bringing the total yield up to 1,292 kantars, which equals a yield of 3.7 kantars per feddan. Nuri Pumping Station report for May: The average final yield of cotton is 4 kantars per feddan; considering that a good deal of the cotton plants were poor, a lot of the good cotton must have yielded 5 kantars.

Kassala Province.—The 1922-23 cotton crop totals 12,705 kantars of 315 rotls; details are as follows (in kantars) :—First class, 4,012; second class, 2,950; third class, 2,835; fourth class, 2,029; fifth class, 879. The average price of the first four classes per kantar was P.T. 412 up to June 5 and P.T. 346 from June 6-15, when the market closed. The fifth class was sold at P.T. 204, Government retaining the seed. Ginning was practically completed by the end of June, and camel transport has proved adequate to move the lint to Atbara and Suakin. Preparations for the new crop are well forward, and cotton stalks are being cut. The canals for the two new demonstration areas at Mekali and Hadaliya, which were only decided upon in February, have been completed. A preliminary allotment of land which it is anticipated will be watered at each canal has been made as follows (the figures representing feddans) :—Mekali, 980; Hadaliya, 1,230. The preliminary demand for land may be considered as satisfactory. Considerable areas have been held for distribution after the extent of flooding is known, particularly at Hadaliya. That land should have been so freely applied for shows confidence in the scheme.

Red Sea Province.—Tokar Cotton Crop: 3,725 kantars were sold during the month. The total yield amounts to 35,731 kantars of 315 rotls, with an average price of £E5.162 m/ms per class. A good average price was obtained and a more satisfactory crop than at one time seemed probable.

Blue Nile Province.—The late pickings on the Sudan Plantation farms were very satisfactory, and the final yields are approximately 3.5 kantars per feddan at Hosh, 4.3 at Tayiba, and 4.1 at Barakat. The total quantity of cotton ginned at the Wad Medani ginning factory was 41,315 kantars. About 70 kantars of American cotton were sent to the Port Sudan factory for ginning, and no doubt a little remains with the cultivators, so that it is probable that the total American cotton crop of the province was approximately 2,000 kantars of 315 rotls.

Gezira Scheme.—Very satisfactory progress has been made during the period both at Makwar and on the canalisation. The canalisation for the Wad El Nau scheme has been completed, and satisfactory pumping tests have been run.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Improved Demand.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended August 15:—

An improved demand has been in evidence during the past few days, further appreciation in the American markets, and comparative steadiness in our own, evidently having the effect of inducing those who have been running a little short to cover their requirements. The inquiry has been fairly evenly divided between Sakels and Uppers, and the basis in both growths has hardened slightly. In the former, the tightness of Strict Good Fair to Strict F.G.F. is beginning to become more pronounced, and it appears very doubtful if the local stock of these grades will hold out much longer than the middle of next month. A certain amount of reselling of Uppers for American account has been evident, probably about 1,000 bales being placed on the market from this source. The most reasonable conjecture of this cotton coming out at the moment is that one or two buyers at the other side purchased earlier in the season right into the autumn months and are now taking advantage of the ruling basis to get out and replace with new crops at a substantial discount. Outside growths, including the Sudan varieties, have been generally neglected. C.i.f. business continues to rule very quiet, and little interest is taken in new crops. Quotations of all grades of Sakels are raised 20 points, Uppers and Brown 10 points Estimated sales total 4,700 bales, against 1,800 bales (for four days) last week. Fully Good Fair Sakel to-day, 16.40d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

A Depressing Week.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended August 18 states:—

General.—Fluctuations in the raw cotton market, coupled with uncertainty regarding the European outlook, have again militated against any improvement in the general state of trade. A thoroughly depressing week has been experienced, with scarcely any bright spots to redeem the general gloom. Manufacturers endeavour to console themselves with the knowledge that markets abroad must be extremely short of supplies, but there seems little prospect of any attempt to replenish them so long as the present uncertainties exist.

Yarn.—Makers continue to sell at prices below production costs rather than close their mills. Although the basic price scheme was a failure, there were at least some spinners who endeavoured to give it a fair trial and to abide by its conditions. These have now gone to swell the number of those whose selling price is "what they can get." Demand for Egyptian spinnings has fallen away considerably, and new transactions of any importance are rare. Shipments last month amounted to 9,514,400 lbs., as compared with 10,290,300 lbs. in June and 19,852,300 lbs. in July, 1922.

Cloth.—Markets abroad do not respond to the higher quotations necessitated here by the rise in raw cotton, and the amount of workable inquiry has probably been smaller than ever. There is an increasing number of traders who are now convinced that lower costs of production are indispensable to a revival of business. Shippers to Turkey and the Levant have been moderately active in securing small lots from stock, but the principal markets (India and China) give very inadequate support. Shipments last month were 316,083,600 sq. yds., against 300,669,100 sq. yds. in June and 443,609,800 sq. yds. in July last year.

Raw Cotton.—There has been an improved inquiry during the past week, and for all descriptions prices have advanced substantially. Reports on the crop condition in the United States are only moderate.

Closing prices are as follows:—American Fully Middling, 15.76; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 16.45.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Darjeeling Himalayan Railway.

The net earnings of the Darjeeling Himalayan Railway Company for the year ended March 31 totalled Rs.3,93,645, giving an available total of Rs.7,40,830. The directors recommend a dividend of 6 per cent. on the ordinary shares and 2½ per cent. on the preference shares for the second half-year, leaving Rs.3,12,080 to be carried over, against Rs.3,17,185 brought in.

Shahdara Light Railway.

The earnings of the Shahdara (Delhi)-Saharanpur Light Railway Company for the half-year ended March 31 were:—Coaching, Rs.2,72,794; goods, Rs.3,03,145; and sundries, Rs.4,520, making a total of Rs.5,80,459, compared with Rs.4,25,100 for the corresponding period of 1921-22. The net revenue was Rs.3,43,153, against Rs.1,43,693. Interest on sterling debentures at the rate of 4½ per cent. per annum and London agency charges have been paid. The United Provinces Government moiety of surplus profits amounts to Rs.1,26,576, managing agents' commission Rs.43,830, and income-tax Rs.8,021, leaving Rs.3,69,143, of which the directors recommend a dividend (free of tax) of Rs.4/8 per share, equal to 9 per cent. per annum, the balance of Rs.3,01,643 being carried forward.

Darjeeling-Himalayan Railway Extension.

The report for the year ended March 31 states that as the net earnings of the extensions were insufficient to give a return of 5 per cent. on the capital expended, the difference will have to be made good by the Government out of their share of the earnings from the interchanged traffic, and the necessary claim for rebate, amounting to Rs.3,381, has been preferred against the E. B. Railway. The amount brought over from the net revenue account for the year was Rs.2,17,091, out of which Rs.1.09,375 was disbursed as an ad interim dividend, leaving Rs.1,07,716. The directors recommend a final dividend of Rs.1,07,716.

Stock and Share Markets.

MARKETS INACTIVE AND DULL.

Oils Better.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Tuesday Morning.

As was to be expected in view of the political situation, a very variable tone has prevailed in the markets. Generally speaking, the tendency has been to weakness, and where changes have taken place in the majority of cases it has been in the downward direction. As is invariably the case in such periods, business has been very restricted, and the volume of transactions during the past week has been smaller than for some considerable period. At the week-end a more optimistic view prevailed with regard to the position, and this was reflected yesterday in something akin to firmness, the recovery in some cases being quite marked. Obviously once the position improves there will be a very general development of business, and I shall not be at all surprised if there are "booms" (in a minor key) in some of the markets. Certainly everything tends to that end. Prices in quite a number of directions could scarcely be lower than they are, and there will certainly be no lack of buyers once people know what is going to happen on the Continent.

There is little fresh to add to what I said last week with regard to pending loans—Near Eastern and otherwise. There is a report of a new proposal by a British group for a Greek loan for the refugees; probably it refers to a development in connection with a loan authorised by the League of Nations for that purpose. It is becoming more and more evident that Turkey will be able to do little without financial assistance, and something will probably be heard shortly of a loan.

Gilt-edged Dull.

A distinctly dull tone has prevailed in gilt-edged descriptions during the past week, though yesterday a firmer tendency was in evidence. Consols are ¼ down at 58¼, War Loan Fives have shed 3-16 at 101¼, the Conversion Loan is ⅛ lower at 79⅝, while Fundings are a point down at 92⅛. Indian stocks have shared in the general weakness. The Seven per Cent. Loan is ¾ down at 120, the 5½ per Cent. Loan is unchanged at 101¼, while the Three per Cent. Loan is ⅛ lower at 59⅞. There has been no great activity in Foreign Government securities, as the political situation has exercised a cramping effect on business. On the whole the tone in this group yesterday was fairly firm. French stocks have risen slightly. War Loan Fives at 25¾ are ¾ up, while the Four per Cents. at 20¾ have gained a point. Italian Rentes are unchanged at 18; while German Three per Cents. remain at 13s. Czecho-Slovak Eight per Cents. have been firm, and at 94¼ are ¼ up. In Near Eastern securities Turkish Unified have firmed up ¼ to 19.

Industrials Inactive.

If anything, there has been even less doing in the Industrial group during the past week than in the previous period. The tone, however, has remained fairly good, and price changes have not been of any great significance. Textiles have been variable, with Coats at 63s. 3d., at which they are 3d. down, and Courtaulds at 63s., at which they show a gain of 1s. 3d. Tobaccos have been one of the few really firm spots, Bats being 3s. 9d. up at 105s., while Imperial Tobaccos are 2s. 6d. up at 72s. 3d. Iron and Steel shares have been steady. Armstrongs are unchanged at 16s. 6d., Guest Keens have gained 3d. at 40s. 9d., while Vickers at 13s. are also 3d. up.

Shipping securities have again been inactive. P. and O. Deferred are a point up at 308, Cunards are unchanged at 18s. 9d., Furness Withys are 27s. 6d., while Khedivial Mails remain at 1⅝. Bank shares have been inactive. Chartered of India are ¼ down at 19½, National of India are unchanged at 44¾, P. and O. Banks are unaltered at 12¾, Imperial of Persias are ⅛ down at 6⅞, while National of Egypt are 22¾.

Oils Steadier.

While a very quiet tone has ruled in the Oil market, a rather firmer tendency has been in evidence than for some time past. It many cases, of course, shares had declined to such an extent that it was extremely unlikely that they would go any lower, and the very extent of the fall was bound to bring about a recovery. This is one of the markets that will first be affected by any general improvement in the political situation.

Burmahs are 1-16 up at 4 17-32, Anglo-Persians are unchanged at 3¼, Mexican Eagles are 6d. up at 20s. 7½d., Shell-Transport are 1-16 higher at 3 11-32, while Lobitos are unchanged at 5⅝. In the Egyptian group Gemsah are 1-16 down at 15-16, while Anglo-Egyptian B are 1-32 up at 1 5-32. In the Roumanian group Phœnix are 1-32 up at 1, Dacia Romanos are unchanged at 25-32, Steaua Romanas are 3d. down at 7s. 9d., while Hamilton's Concessions remain at 1s. 6d.

Egyptians Firm.

Egyptian securities are about the same. Aboukirs are unchanged at 17s. 6d., Beheras remain at 7¼, Egyptian Markets are 9d. up at 23s., Kassala Cotton is 3d. lower at 12s. 9d., New Egyptians are unaltered at 21s. 6d., while Union Foncieres have gained 1-16 at 2.

The Rubber Position.

Rubbers have been one of the few bright features in the market. The quotation for the new commodity has again begun to improve, and shares have not been slow to respond. Very little stock is about in this market, as the majority of shareholders are either permanent investors or are waiting to get out with a profit, and that means that there must be an appreciable advance in prices before there is any quantity of stock about. There is beginning to be talk of the possibility of a rubber shortage in a few years' time, but only the very optimistic would pay credence to such an eventuality. It may happen, but it would be very foolish to count on any such happening. But while discounting ultra-optimism, there is no getting away from the fact that the market position is becoming much brighter, and long-suffering shareholders are fully justified in looking forward to a return of a satisfactory nature at no distant date.

PHŒNIX OIL AND TRANSPORT.

The progress reports of the Phœnix Oil and Transport Company, Ltd., and allied companies (including Roumanian Consolidated Oilfields, Ltd., and "Orion" Societate Anonima de Petrol) for July show that the total crude oil production was 7,712 tons, and the throughput of the refineries 5,305 tons, 241 tons being converted into lubricating oils.

Office Note.—During the month the boiler-house at Well No. 8 Moreni was struck by lightning, but the necessary repairs have since been effected and the well is now again flowing. Well No. 6 Moreni and Orion Well No. 550 have come into production during the current month.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Ratification of the Treaty.

Little or no exception can be taken to the course of the debate in the Angora Assembly on the Treaty of Lausanne. Fire-eating deputies had to have their say, and in turn those who represented frontier constituencies denounced the arrangements made in regard to Thrace, Syria, and Irak. When it came to the voting, however, the weight of opinion behind these extremist utterances was revealed by the preponderating vote—213 for and 14 against—in favour of ratification. In replying to the debate on behalf of the Government, Ismet Pasha appears to have been more in his element than he was at any time at Lausanne. He made a strong point in comparing the foreign policy of the Ottoman Empire, which had combined absolutism at home with unlimited confidence in some foreign Power, with that of the Grand Assembly, which aimed at giving the people as much control as possible over their own affairs and in their relations with other Powers adopted a position of complete independence. Not the least interesting part of the speech was the emphasis laid on the renewal of friendly relations with Great Britain, and Ismet Pasha coupled with it the hope that a satisfactory solution of the Mosul question would eventually be achieved.

Britain and the Peace Terms.

Lord Birkenhead, we may hope, will live long enough to regret his strange outburst on the Lausanne Treaty, and will have opportunity to consider the whole question more carefully before he indulges in further rhodomontades in the Autumn Session. His close study of the Treaty's provisions he will find far less helpful than a consideration of its antecedent conditions. He ignores the essence of the situation when he exclaims that "never in the history of this country has a defeated enemy wrested such terms from the conqueror." The statement may be true, but it does not apply to the present case, for the reason that never in the history of this or probably any other country has an overwhelming force, after inflicting defeat on an enemy, abandoned all that gave it superiority and deliberately encouraged its smallest unit to seek defeat at the hands of that beaten enemy. Lord Birkenhead writes as if he had not been a member of the Government that deliberately galvanised into life the defeated Turks and allowed them, in effect, to snatch victory out of defeat by leaving the issue between Turks and Allies in the hands of Greece as the Allies' only available champion. If Great Britain has made sacrifices in the Treaty of Lausanne, it is by way of amend for a former Government's handling of the Turkish question. The moral equation has now been restored in the Near East as far as Great Britain is concerned, and the least that ex-Ministers who had a share in the post-Armistice blunders can do is to accept the vindication of Britain's honour with the best grace they can muster.

The Evacuation of Constantinople.

Almost on the day that saw the ratification of the Lausanne Treaty by the Angora Assembly the evacuation of Constantinople by the Allied troops began. Their departure will be viewed with mixed feelings. The troops themselves, certainly the British contingents, will have no regrets at abandoning an incongruous position. It will be the foreign community on whom the chief loss falls, as they look forward with some misgivings to the uncertainties that the future has in store. We could wish that the occupation of Constantinople had meant more for the city and its inhabitants than merely a sense of security. Owing, perhaps, to the international character of the occupying force it did not avail itself of such opportunity as it had of exerting a salutary influence upon the life of the city. Apart from training a few individual policemen, who showed a special aptitude for their work, the Allies, as far as we are aware, made no attempt to reorganise the Turkish police and to make it an efficient force. The Turkish fire brigade continued to use its primitive methods side by side with the latest appliances of the British military fire brigade, and all that the latter can claim to have achieved for the future of the city is that they showed the way to better things and finally sold to an untrained body of men, when they left, their up-to-date equipment. As for the moral sphere, Constantinople threatened at one time, it is to be feared, to set its own seal upon its foreign guardians rather than to absorb a new atmosphere from them.

Strikes in Greece.

The Labour Party in Greece chose a wrong moment for a trial of strength with the State when supreme power is in the hands of a military committee. It has received short shrift, and the strike movement, for which widespread support among the trades unions had been secured, has rapidly collapsed. The Greek Labour Party has tried to advance too quickly, and it may well be that it has been led astray by an exotic communism. There is no greater individualist than the Greek, who indulges this characteristic to such an extent that business partnerships are the exception and single-man businesses the rule. Trade unionism in Greece owes its political existence to M. Venizelos; but owing to the latter's prolonged absence from the country after the Armistice, it mapped out for itself a political path that he can hardly have foreseen or desired, at the most impressionable period of its existence. It is, indeed, one of the charges brought against M. Venizelos by his political opponents that he encouraged Labour and endowed it with the power to become the problem or, as they would say, the nuisance that it has since proved. It is reported that the Greek Government has suspended the trade union law. This measure may help to break the strike, but it can hardly be intended as a permanent step. Although Bolshevist theories may have corrupted a number of Greek workmen, there can be little doubt that they have their grievances, which it is the duty of the Government to investigate patiently and sympathetically. Greek labour appears to have no recognised leader who can plead its cause with authority, and for this reason it is the more at the mercy of communist tactics.

The Late M. Daskaloff.

The murder of M. Daskaloff in Prague is a further reminder of the stormy setting in which Balkan politics are staged. M. Stambolisky's Minister of the Interior was at one time the best hated man in Bulgaria. Acting for the Prime Minister during the latter's frequent absences, M. Daskaloff contrived to stamp his own policy on Bulgaria. He was responsible for the persecution and prosecution of the Bourgeois politicians, and, if left to himself, would undoubtedly have driven his country far along the Bolshevist road. The precise relations between him and M. Stambolisky are largely a matter of conjecture. At first forming together a powerful combination, they drifted apart in regard to their political principles, as M. Daskaloff inclined more and more to the extreme left, and M. Stambolisky had his socialism tempered by contact with Western peoples. Towards the end of the Stambolisky régime there was almost an open breach between the two men, and it was recognised that M. Daskaloff's acceptance of the Prague diplomatic post was a face-saving device to cover his exclusion from the Ministry. In the opinion of many he had played the rôle of Stambolisky's evil genius too long. A man of violent methods, he has met a violent death, which can in no way be condoned, but which, it may be hoped, will play its part in warning Balkan politicians of the unwisdom of the abuse of political power.

The Irak Desert Route.

Prominence given to the misfortunes of a party of Arabs who attempted to motor from Damascus to Baghdad may create a wrong impression regarding the prospects of the weekly motor service that is expected to carry the Irak mails between Baghdad and Haifa from October 1. The Arabs were new to the route, were inadequately provisioned and trusted to the guidance of a chance native, who lost his way. The company which will be responsible for the weekly service is a British company employing British drivers; its cars have already performed the journey several times and it is to inaugurate the mail and passenger service with a fleet of new powerful cars, fitted with refrigerators and carrying an ample supply of provisions and water. The value to Irak of weekly communication with Europe cannot be overestimated. For mail matter it has had, thanks to the enterprise of the Royal Air Force, a fortnightly service by air; but the air service was never intended for civilian traffic and would in any case have been of restricted utility for the purpose owing to the limited passenger accommodation and the cost of the trip. It is an essential part of the mail service between Haifa and Baghdad that the desert stretch between Damascus and Ramadie should, at first, be covered in the hours of daylight, and to ensure this, organisation, good cars, and reliable drivers are necessary. The majority of people going to and from Irak will be attracted by the saving of at least a fortnight between Egypt and Baghdad, but although the desert can be shown to offer little danger or difficulty to a properly organised service travellers should be warned against lightly undertaking the desert journey "on their own," and against trusting themselves to unknown transport agents.

Safeguarding the Majority.

The most suggestive items of the recent news from India relate to the organisation of the Hindu Mahasabha, or, as we might say, super-society, designed to unite two-thirds of the population of the country for its own protection. At first sight the need for such a society is not very obvious, for in other countries it is usually minorities which feel the need for such distinctive organisations, but, judging from the extracts from speeches which have reached us, its bias, though not its declared object, is definitely anti-Moslem, and its appearance is one more indication of the exacerbation of religious feeling on which we have had to comment so frequently of late. It is, of course, conceivable that an organisation of the kind might accomplish much useful work, provided that its management was marked by sagacity and restraint, but, unfortunately, those qualities have not hitherto been conspicuous among the men who are at present in charge of the movement, and we must confess that we regard it with some apprehension, as being more likely to retard than accelerate India's painful progress towards national unification.

The Strength of a Nation.

From time to time facts and figures come from India which suggest that the educated classes, in their praiseworthy zeal to shoulder new burdens, have been overlooking the relation between burden and shoulder imposed by stern natural laws. A striking instance is furnished by the record of the last two examinations for the Civil Service which have been held in India. It was hoped that the candidates at these examinations would be picked men in every sense of the word, but two out of every seven have had to be rejected by the doctors as unfit for the work for which they were so eager. One can readily imagine the consternation which would be aroused by a similar proportion of rejections in this country, but there is as yet nothing to show that the Indian Universities are seriously perturbed. The test is by no means severe, and it may fairly be said that the men who fail to pass it are unfit for ordinary civil life. In many parts of India the colleges are overcrowded to an extent which seriously impairs their efficiency. Would it not be worth while for the authorities to weed out of the crowd the lads who will never be fit to give the country fair value for the education they have received?

Protection and Publicity.

There is a great deal of interest in the working of the new Tariff Board, which has just begun to hold its public sittings in India. Putting he expert economists on one side, ordinary people dislike protective tariffs chiefly because of the very unpleasant odour, which suggests that corruption is going on unseen, and India is now attempting to avoid this evil by using the antiseptic of publicity. The men who want their industry protected have to state their case formally before the Board in the presence of the reporters, and their opponents can meet them in the same way; the Legislature, in fact, is to be approached by the front door, and not by the kitchen staircase. It is probably a fortunate occurrence that the steel industry is the first to come before the Board. The steel-makers aver that they must either be protected or close down, the steel users retort that protection will involve their ruin, and, whatever may be the result of the clash of interests, it appears to be certain that the proceedings of the Board will have a very great educative value for the Indian public, which desires to get both steel and steel products cheap, and is inclined to distribute its distrust impartially among the sellers.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

A Slow-Moving Time.

Reparations still hang most heavily over us, and are weighing on Europe's soul almost like lead. It is a somewhat dismal and trying time. Other countries, which have a definite policy on this question of Reparations, are happier than we, who wearily chafe at our impotence. There is, one feels, a growing feeling in this country—by no means as yet a conviction—that our Government has not an adequate grip of the situation; certainly this policy, or rather, practice, of inaction suits very ill the minds of the electors. It was once sufficient, but it is not now sufficient, to point to the terrible legacy left to Mr. Baldwin's Administration by the Coalition Government, but people will not indefinitely consent to see Great Britain withholding her power to act. It may be sound, but it gets you little distance, to deprecate the use of the words "pro-French" or "pro-German"; for in this crisis it would appear that if you are not for France you are against her. Several politicians, we know, are against her; but the mass of the people is still solid against the German State. Perhaps it is a sad pass to which the world has come when the British principles of chivalry and generosity to a beaten foe are inadmissible or inapplicable; but at the moment it is quite certain that we and our intentions are well out in the cold. Nothing is being done, and nothing can be done, it appears, for at least some weeks; some in despair have gone even so far as to believe that nothing will be done until the demise of M. Poincaré—to such depths of unintelligence can impatience move us!

The "Daily Herald."

There is little doubt that we are turning more and more to domestic affairs, and that all our knowledge, political and particularly geographical, that we gained of foreign countries during the War, is fast vanishing. In the days when we knew where, for instance, Kharkov and Przemysl were, we should have noted the disappearance of the Daily Herald with a shrug, but the recent news of this impending event has assumed a certain, although undeserved, significance. It is now stated that unless the Herald can by September 30 next increase its 300,000 readers to half a million it will cease to exist. Now one is not quite so optimistic about Great Britain to suppose that it does not contain half a million enemies to itself, but one can still hope that the aims of the Herald, which, so admirable an organ in the beginning, has in later times become a journal which from any patriotic point of view was almost, although never quite, nefarious, will be unfulfilled. The Herald has recently been a supporter of many causes—all of them by no means lost causes—and the virtues of the Zaghlouls, the Gandhis, and the Lenins of this wicked world have in its eyes appeared monotonously complete. We shall in some ways regret the passing of a journal the literary pages of which could often be read and the betting advice acted upon, but, taken all in all, its disappearance will be a good thing for the working-man, who may not find truth in the capitalistic press, but will surely find more interesting things.

The Changed Face of London.

One of the strangest experiences to those who know London well is to travel through it in the deserted hours, say, early on a Sunday morning; the most familiar effects then assume almost eerie prominence, and in any case to be in the presence of a mighty soul in repose is moving. But, instead of this seeing London owned by Londoners asleep, you can now see London owned by non-Londoners very much awake. Hundreds of American visitors have returned home, but there is still a sufficient leaven of them among the thousands of provincial Britons to make the capital seem and sound strange. It is a little amusing to find in the hardy Cockneys who yet survive in London (having chosen a better time than the present for their holidays) a faint sense of patronage towards these urgent sons of Durham, Somerset, or Massachusetts. But they ask such simple questions (although at times their questions are unanswerable except by the learned Londoner—an oxymoron, by the way), they put such incredible faith in their guide-books, they enjoy everything so very much, that London takes them all to its kind and undiscriminating heart. Only the very poor or unfortunate can feel lonely in London.

The "Laurentic's" Gold.

An extraordinarily good piece of work has been done by the Navy in salving almost all the gold from the wrecked White Star liner "Laurentic," which was torpedoed in 1917 with five millions bullion aboard. For years divers have been at work on the wreck, which lies in twenty fathoms of water, and a very horrible duty it must have been. It is right that publicity should be given to so patient and successful an effort, if only because of the tendency at the moment to appreciate the work of the Air Force at the expense of the Navy. Perhaps our islanders, who go into raptures at the sound of an aeroplane, do not esteem as they should the strength of their more silent guardians, but unless the future defence of Great Britain is proved indisputably to rest in the air, there is no doubt that the people of this country will soon revert to its traditional pride and confidence in the Navy.

The Price of Meat.

I never did like butchers, and if there is any class of men less lofty than dealers in frozen meat I have yet to meet them. Therefore, I always knew that the price of meat was ridiculously high, and now comes the Departmental Committee of the Ministry of Agriculture to confirm one's intuitive knowledge. This committee states that the retailer's net percentage profit is larger than it was pre-War, and the control of prices during the War has been maintained in the post-control period. Profits vary from 13 per cent. on pork to 48 per cent. on frozen beef. This, of course, has been "wangled" by the creation of a ring. The elimination of competition has meant that the consumer in this country has to pay, for instance, 9d. a pound for Australian chilled meat which in cold storage in this same country is 3¾d. a pound.

Gross profiteering in some trades may ennoble a man or those with whom he comes into contact, but not profiteering in meat. The sort of thing frozen-meat millionaires do is to buy up property in the West Country and endeavour to create a monopoly there, stopping up common rights-of-way as if they were some despicable butcher rivals.

Angling.

The increased popularity of angling is, one supposes, one of the minor psychological results of the War; but there is no doubt that far more indulge in this gentle pastime than before 1914. Every week-end you can see leaving London for places like Cookham, Staines, or Marlow placid men with rod, line, and basket. Crowds, literally, of fresh-water fishermen there seem to be now, whereas before the War angling was the most aristocratic of pursuits.

The issue between sea angling and fresh-water fishing will never be settled, like the issue between sea and fresh-water sailing. But it seems pretty certain that there is more sport in the one and more art in the other, though the sea people rightly look down on their dilettante brethren of the fresh water. And there are not many men who know thoroughly both the sea and, say, the Broads, who do not prefer the sea.

But wherever there is water, in land or off the coast, you can see the unlikeliest people pulling up the fish. Angling is, even if one is not skilled, a beautiful relaxation from the "care and money and trouble" of ordinary life, and that—the escape to simplicity from the wearing complexity of normal living—is, of course, the note of modern life.

Dinner and Tea.

Of all the differences that divide nations from one another, and, in a nation, classes from one another, none is more harassing or confusing than that relating to meals. Few Englishmen get really used to the ordinary Continental breakfast, any more than Americans appreciate our own scant breakfast. Again, there are people in this country who like to call the meal before tea dinner, and others who call it lunch; and there is much in a name. (One does not think of the lazy people who have but one meal before tea and call it "brunch.") To this staunch mid-day dinner class the Labour Party belongs; it has recently declared itself in favour of a high tea in the House of Commons, cutting out the dinner.

There is something to be said for the Labour members. Dinner of late years has been a rather arbitrary affair, with an obvious tendency to grow later and later. The "Nine o'Clock Revue," for instance, was expressly timed in the belief that it was impossible decently to finish dinner much before nine, though, in truth, there was nothing in this, because some people will always take longer than they ought over dinner, no matter at what time they begin. Democracy and the late dinner, in fact, do not seem to go hand in hand, and, since nothing can withstand the progress of democracy, it would appear that the end of the late dinner for other than the very well-to-do is at hand.

Regional Loyalty.

A pretty war is now being carried on between representatives of the State and of different localities in England. The public services, civil and military, have been marking out various sites for the development of their various schemes, and have threatened to take control of such places as Holmbury Hill, Lulworth Cove, and Avebury. Now, all these places are either of rare beauty or interest, and one is not quite so committed to the desecration of England as to allow the unintelligent State official blindly to encroach in the name of efficiency. That the public's feeling is against official encroachment on such places is beyond doubt; the Press alone is witness to that fact. No one would wish to deny to the public services room to develop, but they must be told where they can do so without destroying the yet fair face of the country. In the long run, beauty is more than efficiency and peace more than business, and Englishmen are slowly finding this out.

Cairo, August 17.

L'Affaire Moheb.

Accustomed as we are to sensations, seldom have we had a week such as this. The "affaire Moheb" will long linger in the minds of local editors as a very succulent journalistic tit-bit. It all began with the Government's decision to buy cotton. The official announcement was made on the Alexandria Bourse at 12.30 p.m. on August 1. But from the time the Bourse had opened, two and a half hours earlier, there had been heavy buying by speculators, so much so that the price had been forced up a dollar in the course of the morning. When the Government's decision was announced it was obvious that once again the early bird had got the worm. Immediately there arose a demand for an inquiry as to how the news of the Government's intention had leaked out. The Minister of Finance was made the object of every kind of insinuation. His resignation a few days later merely added fuel to the fire.

Subjected to the bombardment of the whole Egyptian Press—for once united—Moheb Pasha last Monday gave an interview to a local newspaper. His statement consisted almost exclusively of accusations of the gravest nature against everybody whom he had occasion to mention. The principal charges were :—

(1) That the Prime Minister himself informed a local journalist of the Government's decision to buy cotton some two hours before the official announcement was issued.

(2) That the Prime Minister and the other Ministers were simply tools in the hand of the High Commissioner, and had agreed to legislation destructive of Egypt's rights, rather than offend Viscount Allenby.

(3) That the Prime Minister had consistently refused to agree to the many desirable projects, of great benefit to the country, put forward by Moheb Pasha.

(4) That he—Moheb Pasha—had only remained in the Cabinet in the hope of being able to act as a check on his colleagues' apparent determination to drag the country down to speedy ruin.

(5) That he eventually resigned because the Hon. E. Scott, Acting High Commissioner, ordered him to do so.

The effect of these statements may be imagined. If the local Press had been excited before, it was now delirious. Above all else did the alleged intervention of the Residency provoke the scribes.

Meanwhile, there had become generally known and accepted as true a version of the Acting-High Commissioner's remarks to Moheb Pasha, and his reason for taking any part in the affair, which reflected badly on the part played by the ex-Minister of Finance. This story was known to thousands of people throughout the country, and the general expectation was that it would be confirmed by an official statement from either the Ministry or the Residency. Pending official confirmation, every newspaper hinted that it knew all there was to be known about this mysterious affair, but none dared be the first to put into print what was in every man's mouth.

The next move was the issuing by the Residency of the following statement to a native paper :—

We have been for some time past au courant with intrigues directed at bringing about a Ministerial crisis. As a result of the numerous declarations that Moheb Pasha had recently made to us of friendship and loyalty towards us, Mr. Scott, when these incidents occurred last week, gave friendly advice to Moheb Pasha to resign. Mr. Scott even went to Moheb Pasha's house. He did all this without the knowledge of the Prime Minister. Moheb has rendered us many services, notably in defending our interests in connection with the compensation of foreign officials. Recently he has particularly tried to maintain amicable relations with us, and it was this that has led Mr. Scott to tell him, in friendly fashion, that all the rumours attaching to his name, in connection with the Government's intervention in the cotton market, were very regrettable, and to advise him to resign. So far as we are concerned, Moheb certainly did not embarrass us, but it seemed to us deplorable that a member of the Government should be accused of very many things, and Mr. Scott told him so. All this was done without the knowledge of the Prime Minister.

Press Comment on the Statement.

The general opinion of the statement may be represented by two quotations, the first from Al Akhbar : ". . . . Moheb, they say, has rendered us many services. Is it for that reason that they have asked him to resign? . . . . The example of Moheb should show to all those who think of following his footsteps that the British are never faithful in their friendships, and that, after having got all they can out of a man they abandon him to his fate." The second quotation is from the Journal du Caire : ". . . . The Residency has attempted to explain, but in fact it has explained nothing. In the insinuations published yesterday the malice towards Moheb Pasha is very clear, but they are only insinuations, and we take the liberty of telling the distinguished diplomatists at the head of the Residency that these insinuations are unworthy of them. Either Moheb is guilty of all that he is accused of or he is not. If he is, why not have the frankness to tell the public that this man, who poses as a victim, has abused the advantages of his official position and can no longer figure worthily among Egyptian Ministers? But if Moheb, on the other hand, is innocent, why then resort to underhand and mean methods of attacking him?"

The Journal du Caire goes on to specify exactly what it is of which rumour accuses Moheb Pasha. "Moheb is accused of having made a certain proposal to the director of an Alexandria bank. The enemies of the ex-Minister affirm that it is as a result of this that Mr. Scott advised Moheb to resign. If this is true why not say so? The country has the right to know. Is it, then, so difficult to tell the whole truth?"

The Prime Minister Speaks.

All that, it might have been thought, was enough to go on with, but a new sensation was provided yesterday, in the form of an interview given by the Prime Minister to Al Mahroussa. After saying that it was not in the general interest to publish the entire truth about the Moheb affair, Yehia Pasha went on to remark that the whole of Moheb Pasha's statement was untrue. Moheb Pasha, while a Minister, had constantly interfered with matters not concerning him, to the great irritation of his colleagues, for which reason the Prime Minister had asked Moheb Pasha to resign. Moheb Pasha had replied that he was a poor man and could not afford to give up his portfolio. Yehia Pasha, therefore, arranged to transfer Moheb to the Ministry of Education, but the other Ministers held a meeting and afterwards told the Prime Minister that they could not remain in a Cabinet of which Moheb Pasha was a member.

Yehia Pasha denied that he had given any journalist advance information of the Government's decision to buy cotton, and, with regard to the interference of Mr. Scott, which, said Yehia Pasha, he much disliked, Moheb Pasha had never said to the Prime Minister that Mr. Scott had ordered him to resign. What Moheb Pasha told Yehia Pasha was that Mr. Scott had advised him to resign, to which Yehia Pasha replied that, much as he disliked this interference, it had nothing to do with the Cabinet's decision to ask Moheb to resign. The Prime Minister declared that, so far from his having refused to agree to proposals beneficial to the country which had been put forward by Moheb Pasha, the latter had never evolved any scheme of benefit to anyone.

So there the matter stands. Everybody has had his say, and nobody has spared anybody's feelings. On the Prime Minister's own admission, the whole truth has not been told, but, since everybody thinks that he knows the whole truth, this does not make much difference. Possible further developments are suggested by Yehia Pasha's having summoned Moheb Pasha from Cairo to Alexandria on Tuesday, and by a lengthy Cabinet meeting yesterday, to which the Procureur-General was summoned, and regarding whose proceedings nothing has been disclosed.

The New Ministry.

The epoch-making session of the new Grand National Assembly has begun, but the Assembly has not yet got into its stride, it has formed its various commissions, which are doing the preliminary work in preparation for the legislation which is to be introduced later.

Apart from the urgent question of the ratification of the Peace Treaty, which is to be the first important act, interest has been concentrated more upon personalities than upon measures. The constitution of the new Ministry provided no great surprises. The chief feature is the exclusion of Reouf Bey, the late Premier; he is succeeded by Fethi Bey, who retains his portfolio of the Interior. Fevzi Pasha remains Chief of the General Staff, and Ismet Pasha continues to be Foreign Minister. This Cabinet would appear to have been formed on a narrow basis, and to suffer from the exclusion of a number of prominent men whose presence in the Ministry might have been expected on the strength of their recognised ability regardless of their political predilections.

The Press opinions upon the new Government are generally negligible, except those of the Tanin, which has long been a voice calling in the wilderness for moderation and sanity. The Tanin has now been joined by the Tevhid, and both criticise the new Ministry. The Tanin mocks at the Premier's declaration that his new Cabinet is a Business Cabinet; it says that, if the new Ministers had been strangers, it would feel inclined to "wait and see"; but, having seen them at work, it has its unfavourable opinions already formed. The Tevhid strikes a different and more fundamental note when it points out that the object of the new Cabinet is to bring about a vast social evolution in the country. The country is unanimous in longing for such an evolution, but where differences have arisen is in the method of carrying these schemes into execution.

Mustapha Kemal Pasha's Speech.

The inaugural address of the President of the National Assembly was somewhat disappointing. Mustapha Kemal Pasha traversed a great deal of old ground about the rise and success of the National movement, and poured out a moult of honest indignation at the atrocities to which the Turkish nation had been subjected; but when one looks for some ideas concerning the peaceful development of the future, there is nothing to be had but some very stony bread. Pride of place in the plans for the future is accorded to the organisation of an efficient army. Such an attitude may well be regarded as a bad omen. After the experiences of the military adventures of the last eleven years, one would really have thought that for a space at least the Turks would consider the advisability of turning their swords into ploughshares and devoting their main energies to the works of peace.

Greek Refugees.

There is one question which is pressing for immediate solution—namely, the disposal of the thousands of refugees, the balance of those who have been uprooted from their secular homes in Anatolia and whose final destination has not been settled. In and around Constantinople, in Selimie Barracks at San Stefano, and on Prinkipo there are about 14,000, while at Samsoun there still remain some 16,000, for whom no provision has been made after September 15. Two ships have been sent from Greece to Constantinople to embark 7,500 of those who are quartered here for Salonika and Kavalla, and it is hoped that arrangements will be made as soon as possible for the balance remaining here; but what will happen to those who are left at Samsoun after the American Near East Relief has closed down in the middle of September is dreadful to contemplate. Six thousand of them are said to be destitute, and unless they are removed to Greece or elsewhere before the winter sets in they are doomed to perish.

The Evacuation.

Preparations for evacuation are proceeding methodically. The Allied Police, as a civil organisation, have ceased to function; a collection of transports has arrived in the harbour; the Turkish exchange is rapidly depreciating; the curio and carpet shops are advertising a fresh supply of bargains in souvenirs, and the police are trying to disarm the civil population now that they alone are responsible for public order and security. The odds against the infliction of prohibition in this city are growing steadily higher. That is the budget of local news.

August 14.

The Constantinople Golf Club.

The British Colony, although it looks at the future with some excusable anxiety, is already beginning to make arrangements to provide itself with some means of relaxation on the dull days that are coming after the evacuation of the troops. The military have since the Armistice constructed an excellent golf course at Mashlak, about two and a-half miles from the north edge of the city, and now a civilian golf club has been formed to take over this 18-hole course, which is 5,325 yards long, and is provided with a good club house with all facilities. The provisional committee has shown commendable enterprise in arranging for transport to and from the course, always one of the principal difficulties in this city, which covers an enormous area and is so poorly supplied with means of communication.

ROUMANIA.

Bucharest, August 20.

The Little Entente and Poland.

Parliament is closed, and most of the Ministers are absent from Bucharest on holiday this month. The chief event of political interest has been the meeting at Sinaia of representatives of the Little Entente and of Poland, whose discussions appear to have been fully recorded in the English daily Press. Commercial treaties have already been concluded with Roumania by Czecho-Slovakia and Poland, and at Sinaia questions relating to trade and transport facilities were further discussed with the representatives of these two countries. One of the results of these discussions appears to have been that the Roumanian Government (according to the Bucharest Press) has promised to begin at once to pay off its debt to the Skoda locomotive factory in Czecho-Slovakia. This factory has had large orders, chiefly for the repair of locomotives for the Roumanian State Railways, and has a large outstanding account to its credit.

M. Duca is said to have made every effort to bring Poland into the Little Entente, but without success so far, partly on account of the political disagreements which still exist between that country and Czecho-Slovakia, and partly because Poland demanded, as a condition of her joining, that the other signatories of the Entente should undertake to come to her aid in case of an attack upon her on the part of Russia. This was felt to be too heavy a charge in view of the other responsibilities of the Little Entente, and Czecho-Slovakia was particularly decided in her refusal of this condition. Very little seems to have been definitely settled at Sinaia, and the conference is to be continued in the autumn at Belgrade or Prague.

Other news from Roumania will be found on page 224.

ALBANIA.

Tirana, August 16.

The Oil Question.

Captain Shearme, the Anglo-Persian Oil Company's representative, arrived back in Tirana from England on Sunday, there being a few outstanding points requiring settlement before the concession goes before Parliament next week. The Government appear to be a little nervous as to the attitude Parliament will take with regard to the concession, mainly because of the counter-proposals put forward by the Standard Oil Company. The Anglo-Persian Oil Company, however, holds the field, as they were granted the concession two years ago, subject only to ratification by Parliament.

Islam in Albania.

Not long since, following on the example of the Orthodox Church, a Congress of Moslems of both the Sunni and Bektashi persuasions was convoked and the complete independence of the Mohammedan religion in Albania was proclaimed. The Khalif has been altogether repudiated. Where prayers are said in Albanian no reference is made to him any longer, and only in certain passages of the Arabic text where this is used does he appear to be still mentioned. The question of the form of prayer to be used in the Mosques is now under consideration.

The Government have not only approved of the decisions taken by the Congress, but have formally recognised the Mussulman High Council, appointed by the Congress, as the supreme Mohammedan authority in Albania. One of the first acts of this Council has been to give definite permission for women to go about unveiled in public. Not many women, however, have as yet taken advantage of this permission, which applies in practice only to the towns; for in the mountain districts it has long been the custom for Albanian Moslem women to uncover their faces.

The Orthodox Church.

The future of the Orthodox Church in Albania depends on more complicated factors. Autocephalism has been formally demanded; but the delegation which waited on the Patriarch of Constantinople to obtain his sanction has returned without having achieved its object. The Patriarch is not prepared to do more than sanction "autonomy," and the extent of this has not been clearly defined. It remains to be seen what steps will now be taken by the Orthodox Churchmen in Albania. There is said to be a strong current of opinion, mainly among the women, in favour of remaining under the headship of the Patriarch. On the other hand, most of the clergy seem to stand for complete auto-cephalism, while there is a small but (so say its adherents) growing movement in favour of union with Rome. Such a solution, it is urged, would unite the Christians of Albania into one body and procure for the State the interested support of the Vatican. It must be said, however, that public opinion at present would, on the whole, be opposed to such a step.

Persia and Irak.

In spite of the British Minister's untiring efforts during the past fortnight to arrive at a settlement of the situation which has arisen from the arrival of the Persian priests at Kermanshah from Nejef and Kerbela as a protest against the action of the Irak Government in deporting a leading Persian high priest for interfering with the elections, as mentioned in my last letter, no solution has yet been found to enable the priests to return to Irak. Feeling against the British continues to run high, and numerous telegrams of protest reach the Persian Government from all parts of the country. On Wednesday some 6,000 people assembled outside the telegraph office in Kazvin as a demonstration on behalf of the priests, but the incident passed quietly.

Sir Percy Loraine, therefore, in order to expedite a settlement, suggested to the Irak authorities that he should proceed to Baghdad by air to discuss matters on the spot, and attempt to reach a settlement. This being agreed to, the Royal Air Force placed two aeroplanes at Sir Percy's disposal, and the machines, with the approval of the Persian Government, which is naturally as anxious as the British to arrive at a satisfactory solution, landed here yesterday. They are the ordinary service battle biplanes, D.H.9 A type, and for this occasion they were, of course, unarmed. They left Baghdad at about 5.45 yesterday morning under Squadron-Leader Bowman, D.S.O., M.C., D.F.C., and arrived here on the landing ground prepared some two miles to the south of the town at midday, thus taking about six hours and a quarter to cover the distance of some 500 miles, rather a slow rate owing to bad visibility between Hamadan and Teheran.

They were the first aeroplanes to effect a non-stop flight from Baghdad to Teheran. They return to Baghdad to-morrow with Sir Percy Loraine, who was anxious to waste no time, and will bring the Minister back when his visit to Baghdad is satisfactorily concluded.

Meanwhile the Mullahs remain in Kermanshah, whither the Shah has sent Prince Azad es-Saltaneh and Hakim ed-Dowleh, Minister of Public Instruction, to welcome them on his behalf.

General News.

M. Shumyatski, who has been acting as Chargé d'Affaires at the Russian Legation since the departure of M. Rothstein, has been appointed Minister Plenipotentiary, and has presented his credentials as such to the Shah. The conferring of the honour was made the occasion of a reception at the Russian Legation.

Khoshtaria, who was much in the public eye last year as being the "concessionaire" of the original Northern Oil Concession before the War, has returned to Persia from Russia, and is now back in Teheran. It is reported that he intends to open a private banking concern as representative of a Russo-Persian commercial company, with branches in the provinces.

Dr. Ryan, the American municipal expert, who recently proceeded to Turbat-i-Haidari to report on the extent of the damage caused by the recent earthquake, has returned, and states that the original reports were much exaggerated. He estimates the death-roll at some 900, and the damage caused at some 60,000 tomans (about £12,000).

The aeroplanes with Sir Percy Loraine reached Baghdad before noon to-day; they left here at 5.30, and stopped a short time in Kazvin.

The Service of Foreigners.

The engagement of another American adviser was approved in place of Dr. Bogart, who is relinquishing his appointment at the Bank of Persia (late Russian Bank) very shortly, and returning to America. On the other hand, the Mejliss has made drastic reductions in the number of European employees in the service of the Government, and the services of many Belgians, Russians, Swedes, and two British subjects, who have been employed in different Government departments for some years past have been dispensed with, and their contracts terminated. The principal exceptions were the Swedish Chief Organiser of the Police and the Belgian Administrator-General of Customs, and Director-General of Posts, whose contracts were renewed for further short periods. The dismissal of these European employees at very short notice was most unexpected, and most of them are in great distress owing to the non-receipt of any gratuity or pension and their inability to find employment in other directions in this country.

Relief for Turbat.

rendered homeless and otherwise affected by the recent earthquake in the neighbourhood of Turbat-i-Haidari. Subscriptions have been started throughout the country for the same purpose, and the American Red Cross Society has sent a donation of 50,000 dollars through the Persian Minister at Washington. In this connection, Dr. Ryan, the American expert engaged for the Teheran Municipality, has proceeded to Turbat to investigate the extent of the damage caused, and to draw up plans for rebuilding and repairing the devastated parts. He told me that there was a question of opening an international relief fund, and that therefore an authoritative report was necessary before inviting subscriptions.

The situation round Turbat has recently been further aggravated by extensive floods following a severe rainfall, which are reported to have washed away much property and to have caused a certain number of deaths. A village near Nishapur, to the west of Meshed, has also been the scene of a flood which has washed away most of the houses.

Pen and Sword in Persia.

The newspaper Vatan the other day published an article attacking the military and criticising the Minister of War. The next day, acting presumably under the latter's instructions, two officers and a number of men entered the office of the editor, dragged him out, and, after beating him nearly to death, left him in the street, whence he was removed to hospital, where he now lies in a critical state. In this country, apparently, the pen is not mightier than the sword.

LANDS OF THE THUNDERBOLT.

"LANDS OF THE THUNDERBOLT: SIKHIM, CHUMBI AND BHUTAN." By Lord Ronaldshay. (London: Constable and Co. 16s. net).

This is no ordinary book of travels, for it contains a record not only of the distinguished author's travels in Sikhim, Chumbi ,and Bhutan, but some important chapters on Buddhism and special mention of Lamaism (a comparatively modern development of Buddhism), which are so admirably clear and free from all semblance of pedantry as to appeal to scholars, to students, and, in fact, to all readers. For the origin of the title the reader is referred to the Preface, where it is explained that one of the chief emblems of Guru Rimpoché, the founder of Lamaism, was the vajrah or dorje, or symbol of the thunderbolt of Indra: here it may be explained that Rimpoché is regarded in those countries as a more important person than even Buddha himself.

The book commences with two chapters which deal with Bengal, an essentially flat country, which are introduced doubtless by way of contrast to what is to follow, i.e., a description of the highlands which include the Everest and Kanchinjunga groups. Similarly the description of the coming of summer in the torrid clime of the Gangetic delta is inserted skilfully by way of offset to the subsequent pages, which contain an account of life in a country that lies often above the limit of the snow-line. Several very valuable chapters, descriptive of Buddhism, follow, which cannot be even summarised, much less given adequate treatment, within the limits of a brief review.

Chapter VIII. tells of the author's journey into Sikhim by the path via Sandakphu Phillut, across the Singalela Pass to Pemiongchi: the description of the last mentioned and its celebrated monastery, with a most glorious view from its portico of Kanchinjunga, also those of Tashiding and Sanga Chelling, are admirably done. In these monasteries, as, indeed, elsewhere in the neighbourhood, are to be seen images that show the extent of the "wave of eroticism," which, starting possibly from Kamakhya, where is the great Tantric shrine, passed over this corner of India centuries after the founding of the Buddhist faith, and which may have helped in causing its disappearance from the plains of India. But the author went much farther afield than Sikhim, for Chapter XIII. describes his trek to the far-off Chumbi valley (a name familiar to us in the Tibet Expedition of 1904), and Chapter XVIII. the journey to the Gochak La (16,430 ft.). One of the most interesting chapters is that dealing with the author's extended tour through Bhutan, which before was, to Europeans, a practically unknown country; there is also an account of the events which led up to the Bhutan War of 1864-65, and of the subsequent rise to power of the present ruler Sir Uggyen Wangchuk, under whose capable and enlightened administration what was formerly a State inhabited by barbarous savages now sends its sons to Darjeeling and Kalimpong to be educated in our schools. The present Maharaja is a fast friend of the British Government and seconded by the late Bhutanese agent to Great Britain, Uggyen Kazi, has shown himself most anxious to develop the resources of his country and to extend trade between Bhutan and British India.

Lord Ronaldshay has on pp. 185-186 some remarks descriptive of his feelings on leaving Darjeeling for the last time which will appeal to many of us who have served in India, specially those who have resided in that queen of Indian hill stations.

The book contains some very beautiful photographs, which are the work of the distinguished author; it has an excellent index, and is moderately priced.

GREEK POLITICS.

A statement by M. Venizelos on Greek politics inevitably commands attention. When, therefore, he urges that the most pressing need of Greece at the present time is a cessation of civil strife and restoration of the normal functioning of the Constitution, it may be taken for granted that in his opinion Greek internal feuds have assumed serious proportions, while he recognises that constitutional government is entirely in abeyance. Independent evidence of the seriousness of the quarrel between Greek political parties is given by the Athens correspondent of The Times, who states that the feud between Royalist and Venizelist "is no mere matter of words; it is something vital, responsible for the wrecking of many Greek homes, for the breaking off of betrothals, and for the dissolution of business partnerships." He adds that it is difficult for an Englishman to conceive the intensity of this feeling which divides the whole of Greece into two hostile camps; and to illustrate it he cites a Royalist who claims that there are "thousands of others" who, like himself, have sworn that the mourning they now wear will one day be dyed red "with the blood of the Venizelists." To anyone who has made an impartial examination of the position in Greece it is well known that the picture is not overdrawn. The feud dates from 1916. Four years ago, when M. Venizelos was in power and King Constantine an exile, the cessation of civil strife, for which the former now pleads, was urged in the columns of The Near East, and it was suggested that, unless M. Venizelos elected to bring back King Constantine on terms, the latter's return might take place in his despite and lead to the driving of Greece's greatest statesman into the political wilderness. In those days M. Venizelos or his advisers—for owing to his prolonged absence from the country he was compelled to rely upon others for his reading of the trend of Greek affairs—affected to regard the Royalist following as negligible, and the need for the cessation of civil strife, so obvious to the onlooker, was not appreciated. The pendulum has swung violently in Greece since then; King Constantine was brought back, and M. Venizelos left the country—never, in all probability, to return; even the revolution that deprived the King of his throne a second time failed to make Greece safe for M. Venizelos. It did, however, as a result of the execution of M. Gounaris and his fellow Ministers, fan the flames of hatred to a white heat and produce a condition of things which, if prolonged indefinitely, might involve the country in complete ruin.

Where passions are easily aroused, they can usually be relied upon to die down with almost equal rapidity, and with the exercise of tact by those now in authority or prominent in Greece, the situation need not have been regarded as hopeless. It is, however, unfortunate that M. Venizelos has chosen to couple his appeal for a cessation of civil strife with a statement of modified support for a republican movement in Greece. Nothing is more calculated to cause the Royalists to raise their standard high and close their ranks, for they know that the Venizelist party cannot be relied upon to show the reasoned moderation and dispassionate caution of which its leader is capable. M. Venizelos denounces any idea of enforcing by violence a republic on Greece, but he does not consider the Greek people as still immature for a purely republican régime. He finds that "the creation of a republican party destined gradually to enlighten the people on the real meaning of a pure republic, and to constitute an oppositional force, looming in the mind of the existing régime and restraining it from constitutional trespasses, is quite natural." Unless they feel deterred by the Royalist's oath, this pronouncement might well prove sufficient to transform the Venizelist extremists into an avowed republican party, which, if it could claim any considerable numbers, would intensify and perpetuate the political bitterness in the country.

It remains to be seen, however, how many Greeks will be content to follow an absent leader for all time, and to commit themselves to the uncharted seas of republicanism without any prospect of his immediate guidance. In its early stages Venizelism represented a movement for which there was undoubtedly room in Greece. There had been a tendency previously to restrict social position and political power within the narrowest limits. For a long time an increasing number of people who felt themselves qualified for a place in the sun in a democratic State had been knocking at the gate of caste privilege. On the arrival of a new man in M. Venizelos they rallied instinctively to his banner, and his political wisdom and statesmanship gave promise that his followers would play an important part in winning Greece to a policy of Liberalism. The Imperial aspirations and foreign cares with which M. Venizelos allowed himself to be overwhelmed as a result of the Great War left no time for the elaboration of a Liberal policy. Venezelism in the hands of hurriedly selected subordinates became, during the absence of M. Venizelos, in no way distinguishable from any previous phase of Greek politics, except possibly for a greater abuse of power. When M. Venizelos returned to Athens the mischief had passed beyond his control. It is time now that the country rid itself of its seven years' curse. We had hoped that the Revolutionary Committee, by maintaining itself above parties and politics, would spare the Venizelists the odium of the execution of the Ministers, and by withdrawing into private life with their responsibilities on their own heads, would leave Royalists and Venizelists to realise that only by an end being put to their vendetta could Greece rise superior to the ills that had come upon her. But the Committee is also concerned to make Greece safe for itself, and M. Zaimis has probably hit upon the only possible solution of the problem by appealing to the Venizelists to abstain from taking part in the elections as a party and to submerge themselves in his own Party of Reconciliation until Greek politics can be remodelled on healthier and more profitable lines. If M. Venizelos could have endorsed this appeal, it might have proved better for Greece than to have a further ingredient in the form of republican doctrines thrown into the cauldron of civil strife, which, in the history of Greece, will always be associated with the name of Venizelos.

CONDITIONS IN ABYSSINIA.

Our Correspondent in Addis Abeba writes, under date July 20 :—

The Internal Situation.

The rainy season has set in, with the usual result that, to the outward eye, the internal politics of the country are in suspense. The rains begin to slacken about the middle of September, and by the Feast of the Cross (Maskal), which occurs during the last week of that month, they are usually over. In former days the Government viewed the approach of Maskal with a certain amount of apprehension, and with reason. In Abyssinia there is a season for going to war, just as there is a hunting season in England. This season begins immediately after the rains, when the wells and water-courses are full, forage and grain are abundant, and man and beast can subsist on the countryside. Moreover, it is the custom, as part of the ceremonial attaching to the celebration of the feast, to hold parades of large bodies of troops. It follows, therefore, that, if trouble is brewing against the Government, it is more likely to show itself at Maskal than at any other time.

No trouble, however, is to be expected this year. The Shoan Government are probably in a stronger position at the present time than they have been since the death of the Emperor Menelik. Lij Eyassu, the lad appointed by Menelik to succeed him, was deposed in 1916, but at that time the Central Government were unable to lay him by the heels. So long as he remained at liberty he was a cause of unrest and a source of anxiety to the Government. Fortunately, the chiefs of Tigré, in the North, with whom Lij Eyassu had taken refuge, were induced two years ago to surrender him to the Government, and his confinement has removed the chief danger to the peace of the country.

But though the Government are safe from attack, it is not to be supposed that there are no clouds on the horizon. To be safe from attack does not imply, for example, that the Government can with safety attempt to administer the country in a manner contrary to tradition or to the ideas of their followers. And yet this is exactly the hazardous experiment which they are likely to be driven to make.

The Slavery Question.

The pressure comes from without. The interest taken in Abyssinia by the outside world, the growth of which was arrested by the outbreak of the War, is being rapidly reawakened. Abyssinia is being rediscovered, with the result that people in Europe and America are seriously concerned at the misgovernment of the country which has been thereby revealed. There is a demand for investigation and reform which the Powers and the League of Nations, whose attention has been drawn in particular to the question of slavery, cannot ignore. The Abyssinian Government are aware of this, and would willingly try to set matters right if they knew how. But this is not a case of "Where there's a will there's a way." The difficulties are enormous. Abyssinia never has been administered in the sense understood in civilised countries. If the Government tries to interfere with the customs of centuries, they may raise a storm beyond their power to quell. The lesser chiefs and the priests, who form the backbone of the community and whose hold on the common people can only be maintained by resistance to all progress, are, and always will be, against reform of any sort. It follows, therefore, that the introduction of any reforms imposed upon the Abyssinian Government by the pressure of public opinion abroad will be resented bitterly by that section of their people whose support it is essential for them to retain. An unpleasant prospect!

Attention abroad has been concentrated chiefly on the question of slavery. For months past the English Press has been signalling a recrudescence of slavery in Africa, and pointing to Abyssinia as the source of the evil. These statements have recently received substantial confirmation at the hands of the French Government. The Assembly of the League of Nations is to consider reports on the matter in September next.

Abyssinia and the League of Nations.

The Abyssinian Government are dealing with the situation thus created with considerable address. Their attitude was defined by the Regent, Ras Tafari, a few weeks ago, in a statement made for publication in The Times. Briefly, the Abyssinian Government recognise the gravity of the question, and are taking their own measures independently to suppress the slave traffic in the countries under their own control. Although they have received no communication from the League of Nations, they wish it to be known that they are prepared to assist the investigations of the Assembly by supplying such information as is in their possession. They will co-operate in measures taken by the League to suppress the traffic in the Red Sea and other African territories, but they will resent any action taken by the League which would tend to fix responsibility for the present state of affairs on the Abyssinian Government alone. For this reason a Commission of Enquiry sent by the League to Abyssinia alone would not be acceptable. They point out that the information available shows that slaves are captured as often in British territory as within the boundaries of Abyssinia; that the slave raiders concerned are as often British subjects as Abyssinians; that slaves pass through French Somaliland as well as Abyssinia on their way to the coast; and that the men who deliver the slaves to the waiting dhows are almost always Arabs, who are certainly not Abyssinian subjects, but are sometimes British or French subjects. They argue, therefore, that responsibility for the existence of the slave traffic, wherever it lies, must be shared by the British and French Governments.

It must be admitted that the Abyssinian Government have acted correctly, and by so doing have gone a long way towards putting themselves right in the eyes of the world. Moreover, my information goes to show that they are really doing their best to stop the traffic in their own country. Whether their efforts will be successful and will be sustained remains to be seen. In any case, the League might well help with encouragement and advice, and by arranging for the co-ordination of the measures which are being taken independently by the British, French, and Abyssinian Governments.

The Administration of Justice.

It is to be hoped that the Abyssinian Government will have the wisdom to deal betimes with another question, which otherwise will assuredly give them a great deal of trouble, and that is the question of the administration of justice in suits between Abyssinians and foreign subjects. The procedure in these cases is governed by the provisions of what is known as the Klobokowsky Treaty, a treaty made between the French and the Emperor Menelik some fifteen years ago. It was therein agreed that in the hearing of suits between Abyssinians and French subjects the Abyssinian judge should be assisted by the French Consul, and that judgment should be given in accordance with the law of the country to which the defendant in each suit belonged. In the case of disagreement between the Abyssinian judge and the French Consul, the suit was to be sent for trial before the Court of the Emperor himself. This procedure was accepted in practice by Great Britain and the other Powers concerned in the case of their respective subjects. The machinery thus provided worked moderately well until a year ago, when, with the laudable intention of facilitating and expediting procedure, the Abyssinian Government created a new and permanent tribunal, under the name of the "Special Court," to deal solely with these cases. The foreign Consuls, as before, sat in this Court. Unfortunately, from lack of experience and lack of authority, the Court has not proved equal to its task. Many complaints are levelled against it, of which the most serious is that whereas the execution of decrees passed by the Court against foreign subjects is promptly enforced by the Consul concerned, foreign subjects find it impossible to obtain execution of decrees passed in their favour against Abyssinians. It is doubtful whether the Abyssinian Government realises the extent of the irritation felt by foreign residents over this matter, or the concern which it is causing in the foreign Legations.

Belgium and Abyssinia.

An event of diplomatic interest is the arrival of M. Gérard, the newly appointed Belgian Minister. Hitherto the Belgian Government has not been represented diplomatically in this country, and some speculation has been caused over the new move, more especially as it is understood that M. Gérard has come from the important post of Director of the African Department at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs at Brussels. It is thought that the recent acquisition of an alcohol monopoly in this country can hardly account for the bringing up of such heavy artillery.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London,
Tuesday Morning.

The European Situation.

It cannot be said that the position with regard to the European problem has been vitally altered by M. Poincaré's Note. As I forecasted, it was distinctly conciliatory in tone; it was none the less indicative of France's resolution to pursue the course that she has mapped out. "The brokers have been put in; they will remain until Germany has paid" sums up the situation. From France's point of view that may be all right; from ours it is all wrong, but then our Ally has not felt the effects of the impasse. Unfortunately, the fact has to be admitted that there is little or nothing we can do at the moment to modify the position. Those who would counsel cutting ourselves adrift from the European problem are hopelessly beside the point. For good or ill, events have made us a part of Europe, and in no conceivable circumstances could we remain unmoved by developments across the water. We are now linked to Europe, and a recognition of that fact is essential to an understanding of the problem with which we are confronted and on the solution of which the future of our trade endeavour and the unemployment question depend. One imagines that matters are likely to remain as they are at present for some time at any rate. It can only be hoped that by the time the Imperial Conference meets events will have taken a more favourable turn, and that then the Prime Minister will be able to intervene to better effect.

The Turkish Market.

Discussion is naturally rife as to the difference that peace with Turkey will make to our trade. Disappointments since the Armistice have been so many and various that it is only natural that commercial circles should wax hopeful over the ratification, more especially in view of the problematic European situation. The question which is discussed in detail in an article on another page, is one which cannot now be answered, as it might have been if peace had come reasonably soon after the Armistice. In that event it would have been possible to anticipate an immediate and direct influence on trade, but the long years that have elapsed have simply exhausted Turkey's resources, and have crippled her capacity for trade. Commercial developments in the immediate future depend on Turkey's capacity to export, and that, so far as my information goes, is at present limited, consisting largely of the product of this season's yield of dried fruits. As pointed out in the article in question, a loan is an essential preliminary to Turkey's economic recovery. The rest must depend upon the Turks themselves. If they show themselves capable of applying to industry the qualities that they undoubtedly possess, the future of the country should be bright, and it should not be long before the Turkish market comes to assume a very considerable importance.

The Coming Egyptian Season.

In a very short time the Egyptian season will have commenced, and there is considerable hope in regard to the prospects of the tourist traffic, and justifiably so, for the recent discoveries have given Egypt an advertisement of a unique order. If only the world were making real progress towards reconstruction, it would be possible to be very optimistic on the subject, for it is certain that in anything approaching normal times there would be a rush to the valley of the Pharaohs with which the existing hotels could scarcely cope. As it is, the attraction of the late lamented Tutankhamen may suffice even in existing circumstances to draw quite a considerable crowd out to Egypt, and if the country does not have the "bumper" season that it might reasonably expect, it will have the satisfaction of knowing that it is but a deferred event. The fascination that Egypt exercised before the War has been more than renewed, and if only the attractions of the country are judiciously kept in the foreground, there need be no question of the failure of any subsequent season.

Rupee Exchange Weakness.

The weakness of the rupee exchange has been a noticeable feature of late. The rate has been down to 1s. 3 15-16d., and at the time of writing is only fractionally above that figure. The main reason is, of course, to be found in the weakness of India's export trade, and it has to be remembered that this is the period of the year when exports naturally decline and the exchange weakens. I am inclined, however, to regard the present development as to some extent a reflection of the obscure commercial outlook generally.

Irak and the Exhibition.

An Irak contemporary very appositely raises the question why arrangements have not been made for that country to be represented at the British Empire Exhibition. Palestine is, of course, to be represented, and there would seem to be no good reason why Irak should not play an equally prominent part at the exhibition, which offers an admirable opportunity for displaying the potentialities of the country. If it is not yet too late, the authorities would be well advised to take the necessary steps.

Commerce and Industry.

(Reports from Our Own Correspondents.)

ROUMANIA.

Bucharest, August 20.

The Petroleum Industry.

A delegation from the Petroleum Industries Association was recently received by M. Sassu, Minister of Industry and Commerce, and presented to him two important petitions. The first asked for a prompt decision regarding applications made in accordance with the law of June, 1920, for authorisations, transactions, concessions, and the prolongation of concessions. Many such applications have been held over by the Ministry of Industry and Commerce for more than a year in view of the Government's intention to include in the new Constitution a law for the nationalisation of the sub-soil. The new Constitution has now been adopted, and it authorises the passing of such a law; but the law itself and the regulations for its administration are still in the drafting stage, so that the Ministry of Industry and Commerce is apparently still unable to come to any decision as to how the said applications are to be dealt with. This state of affairs is, of course, a serious hindrance to the development of the petroleum industry, and the petition strongly urges that some decision be taken without further delay. M. Sassu's reply was not very satisfactory, as he merely promised that after the vote had been taken on the mining law at the September session of Parliament a committee should be appointed to settle the outstanding questions of concessions, etc.

The second petition asked that the petroleum industry should be represented on the commission which has been appointed to draw up the law regarding the future régime of the petroleum pipe lines. The large pipe lines leading to the ports are, and will probably remain, a State monopoly. This is said to have been found necessary in order to avoid private monopolies and so to protect the interests of the small petroleum enterprises. The small pipe lines from the wells to the refineries, etc., are in private hands, and it is not proposed that the State should interfere with the ownership of these. It is felt, however, by the petroleum producers that their experience and convenience should be consulted in the drafting of a new régime for the pipes, and this M. Sassu willingly agreed to, inviting the delegation to appoint representatives to sit on the pipe-line commission.

The writer of an article on this subject published in the Moniteur du Pétrole Roumain for this month, while expressing gratification at M. Sassu's helpful attitude in this regard, remarks how regrettable it is that the Roumanian Government has not yet adopted as a governing principle the method so long practised in England, of consulting the industries concerned when new laws are being drawn up which directly affect their interests. This method naturally tends to give the laws a permanent character, seeing that the experience of those best acquainted with the working conditions of the industry has been used to make them cover all important points.

Exports for Half Year.

The total exports of petroleum products during the first six months of this year has been as follows, according to the Moniteur du Pétrole Roumain (the figures representing metric tons):—January, 19,389; February, 19,764; March, 34,810; April, 41,768; May, 23,879; June, 37,717; total, 177,308. This figure is about a thousand tons less than that for the corresponding period of last year. The exports for the second half of the year, however, generally exceed those for the first half, and it is to be hoped that conditions will have so improved by the end of the year that this year will prove no exception to the rule. The fixed prices for the home market have recently been raised, to the satisfaction of the producers, and this will probably give a fresh impetus to the internal trade, so that any increase of exports will depend upon an increase of production, and this again is dependent upon the attitude of the Government towards the first petition mentioned in this article.

Vegetable Oils.

The production of vegetable oil is a favourite industry of the inhabitants of Bessarabia, mostly in the towns, and it is reported that in 1922 3,220,000 kilograms of vegetable oil were produced in that province. At the price of about 28 lei per kilogram this represents a value of over 90 million lei.

GREECE.

Athens, August 4.

The Drachma.

Instead of causing an appreciation of the drachma the announcement that peace had been signed at Lausanne had an entirely opposite effect. On the very same day that the news came through the pound sterling made an extraordinary jump, gaining about 40 points in less than three hours. The fall of the drachma continued until yesterday, when it reached a maximum of 320 to the pound, subsequently improving to 270.

This new depreciation of Greek currency is attributed mainly to the gambling on the exchange, which has recommenced with renewed vigour, also to the future financial uncertainty.

There is a rumour here to-day that M. Diomede, Governor of the National Bank of Greece, now in London, has secured one million sterling out of the six million refugee loan authorised by the League of Nations. If this rumour proves correct, the drachma should once again improve.

TRADE WITH TURKEY.

The Need for Confidence.

The ratification of the Treaty of Lausanne by the Angora Assembly formally ushers in an era of peace in the Near East, for the first time practically for twelve years. The question at once arises: Of what use is the new Turkey likely to be to the British manufacturer and trader? As far as can be judged, the answer is at present almost invariably determined by the personal or political feelings of the individual, according as he labels himself Turcophobe or Turcophil, the outlook is for him gloomy or the reverse. There are, however, a large number of business people who are neither one nor the other, and they would prefer to have an answer to the question based on something more reliable than propaganda or emotions. If the Turks are going to adopt for all time the attitude that the Nationalists have affected since the Armistice, the outlook is admittedly a poor one. Many of those who claim to have knowledge of the Turk are convinced that in these last four years he has been showing his true colours, and that he will always remain what he has been. In other words, the Turk, it is argued, is instinctively anti-foreign, and now that he is at liberty to indulge his predilections, life and business in Turkey for the foreigner will be impossible. This lugubrious prognostication labours under the mistake that the Angora Turk himself has been inclined to fall into. He has imagined, in his ignorance of world conditions, and under the glamour of what has been achieved in or from Angora, that henceforth Turkey can live entirely to herself in a beautiful, nation-tight compartment where the foreigners cease from troubling and the Faithful take their rest. Before the ink of the Lausanne Treaty was dry, however, the majority of thinking Turks knew that this could not be the case. No nation lives to itself nowadays; least of all can Turkey, impoverished by a dozen years of war—the Turko-Italian war was in 1911—denuded of many of the necessaries of life, and, above all, fired with new ideas of Turkey's rôle in the world that will call for the satisfying of numerous material wants, if the ideas are to be lived up to.

There cannot be the least doubt that the demand for goods will be there in Turkey—for everything, from boots to motor-cars, conditioned, of course, by certain obvious facts, the numerical strength of the market and the habits and customs of the people. A foreign loan, it goes without saying, is an essential preliminary. Turkey can have little money of her own to spend at the present time; but she has the natural resources and an industrious people. No less important, she has most certainly the will to make good. Given a loan, which it is to be hoped will be earmarked for definite reproductive purposes, the one uncertain factor that must be conceded to the pessimist who "knows the Turk" is the capacity for sustained effort of those who now supply the nation's motive power. It has to be admitted that in the past the Turk has frequently displayed great zeal for this or that reform, or even for reforms in general, but the zeal has a knack of evaporating in a comparatively short time. Will this particular weakness of the Turk continue to repeat itself? The future alone can tell. The past is no guide, although it may be a warning. To-day what has been termed the will to make good is much more widely distributed among the people than it has ever been before; again, a younger generation of Turks is coming to the front. These circumstances may safeguard the country from one of its besetting sins. If they do not, the value of Turkey as a market for British goods will remain unaffected at the outset, for the original demand will still be there. The worst that has to be feared is the possibility of a gradual diminution of the value of the market; but before that takes place other factors may well have arisen to administer a further check to the tendency to slackening of effort.

But, says the pessimist, although the demand may be there, the conditions with which it is hedged round make the market an impossible one to cater for. It is difficult to believe that this is a serious complaint on the part of a British business man. The position of England in the world of commerce could never have been built up on such weak-kneed principles. Trade with China from sixty to eighty years ago was carried out under conditions far more onerous and dangerous than any that Turkey can reproduce to-day. If the timid drop out of the running now, there will be plenty to take their place.

What is most desirable, however, is that fears about the Turkish market should not gain currency as the considered attitude of the British manufacturer and trader. The surest way of demoralising that market is to let the Turks get it into their heads that they cannot look for honest business deals with firms of standing, but must turn to the men who are out only to make money quickly, and for this reason are prepared to take risks, provided that the possible profits are large enough, and to bribe if necessary to gain their end. Adventurers of this type may be useful in certain circumstances, but Turkish resources deserve a better fate, and what is required is that British trade with new Turkey should be gradually built up on a sound and permanent basis. To this end a little confidence is necessary at this juncture. Instead of settling down to the conviction that Turkey and the Turks can never improve, let British firms proceed tentatively by showing themselves ready to give the Turks credit for better intentions, now that they have reached their nationalist goal of complete independence, and to trade for reasonable profit if the Turks show themselves anxious to treat foreign interests rationally.

That these are not altogether the counsels of perfection of those who have not had to do with the Turks can be shown by extracts from a letter from an English business man long resident in Turkey. He writes:—

> England should be advised to lend a hand to Turkey. She should have done it four years ago; let her do it now at least. England complains of lack of markets for her goods. She is also fearful of entering the Turkish market at present, and is inclined to wait and see. Our merchants in the past built up her greatness by courage, and entered worse fields than Turkey now offers, and made good. If there is a universal "wait and see" attitude adopted towards Turkey, troubles will follow and perhaps Bolshevism. If life is not immediately put into this place by trade, there will be lack of work and lack of food; and it is on the empty stomach that revolution marches. The present decent element in Turkey needs to be encouraged and helped through her early needs, and our Government should, if necessary, guarantee traders to come in. This would, in the long run, be cheaper than to face a second Russia. If the right big British Man wants a fair deal with the Turk, and comes out himself and asks for it, he will get it. The Turk still likes us best.
> The word to Turkey is this: You are poor and your country impoverished through the strain of the past twelve years. You must lean on some country both for your financial needs and for technical experience. Look around and choose this country. You had a man who misrepresented your nation and brought about enmity between our two countries—Enver Pasha. We had a man who misrepresented our country and accentuated this enmity—Lloyd George. Offset one against the other and resume where we left off. There may even be some other country you may wish to choose, but think well and do not experiment unwisely. You must not now try and administer your country from taxes on its present reduced trade. This is now but a small, delicate plant that needs careful cultivation. You must engender a feeling of confidence and obtain a loan, which must be wisely used in developing Asia Minor and its products. When such development begins, still tax lightly; let it grow, and then you will have an assured revenue to the benefit of the individuals and the greatness of your country. Do not be afraid to be humble and acknowledge your present commercial unpreparedness. Take advice and take assistance and await the assured results.

PREPARING FOR THE EXHIBITION.

Wembley To-day.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

Though so far as one could judge in a casual tour round the site of the British Empire Exhibition a great part of the work of construction still remains to be done, the buildings already on the site have gone far to change the face of the landscape of North-West London. The Stadium, which dwarfs the other buildings, and yet promises to blend so beautifully into the completed scheme, is to that region something of what the Crystal Palace is to the South. Possibly, I might even say probably, it is viewed with a jaundiced eye from the famous Hill, for the landmark is a very visible portent of the time when Harrow, too, will be numbered among the suburbs. That development, inevitable in any case, has been greatly hastened by the decision to hold the Exhibition at Wembley, and I have no doubt that in a very few years that hamlet will be the centre of a very populous region.

Already a great change has been effected in the appearance of Wembley, which has lost the atmosphere of rural peace that lay so pleasantly upon it. Its roads have been modernised, its railway communications extended, there is to be an arcade, while all that remains of the park which forms the site of the Exhibition are those of the trees that it has been found possible to preserve. These will add immensely to the picturesqueness of the setting of the Exhibition. While, as I have said, much has still to be accomplished, sufficient has been done to enable one to form a very good idea of the grandeur of the conception of the scheme. On the side of the main entrance there is a semi-circular colonnade, and from within one has a straight view to the Stadium, which rises a massive, impressive edifice, also of concrete, in the distance several hundred yards away. The idea of spaciousness has been well realised, and it would be difficult to imagine a more noble or more suitable approach to the Exhibition halls than is presented by that broad expanse, which is flanked on the one side by the Hall of Engineering and on the other by the Palace of Industry, both of which are rapidly approaching completion.

In the intervening space between the approach and the Stadium there is to be a lake, crossed by a bridge which is in process of construction, and between the lake and the Stadium there is an avenue of trees which will give the last finishing touch to a spacious idea. If the other sections of the Exhibition are in keeping with the promise presented by this part of the scheme, then the City of Concrete will be a marvellous spectacle fully worthy of the high object of demonstrating the economic potentialities of the British Empire.

The buildings of the various parts of the Empire will stand behind or adjacent to the Palaces of Industry and Engineering, and considerable progress has already been made in regard to some of them, notably the Indian section and the Canadian pavilion, though others have not yet been commenced. There is also to be an Amusement Park, for while the purpose of the Exhibition is to promote commercial relations within the Empire, it is naturally essential to provide diversions for the multitudes who will visit it next year. This Park is situated well to the left between the Stadium and the railway line, and is quite away from the Exhibition proper.

It is difficult in mere words to give a real idea of the vastness of the Exhibition, but some idea of it may be gained by pointing out that the Palace of Industry alone covers eight acres, while the Hall of Engineering is larger still. Certainly the Exhibition will not be an event than can be looked over in an hour or so. I should think it probable, indeed, that several visits will be required to see all the wealth of the resources of the Empire that will be displayed. Certain it is that the Exhibition will be a comprehensive and dignified presentation of our capabilities, and it will be strange if the result is not an invaluable contribution towards the solution of the vexed problem with which this country is now confronted in regard to the development of overseas trade.

TURKISH TRADE IN SCHOOL SUPPLIES

There are at present between 80,000 and 100,000 students in the various schools in Turkey. Supplies for the schools are not bought by the Turkish Government, but are purchased by the individual schools and institutions (says an American Consular report). Each of these has its own budget for expenditures, and one member of the school board usually acts as purchasing agent, buying all the supplies needed in the local market.

Paints are rarely used in the schools. What little art instruction is given is limited practically to conventionalised forms with little or no colour work. It is believed, however, that water-colour painting will be taken up more and more as time goes on.

Chalk and crayon are in considerable demand in the Turkish schools. Germany leads in this trade, except in coloured chalks, which are supplied as well by France, England, and in a smaller degree by the United States. Coloured chalk costs about 20 piastres for a box of 100 pieces, while white chalk costs about 17 piastres for a small-size box. Germany also controls the trade in pencils. Copying pencils and No. 2 in graphite are most in demand.

The specific rates of the so-called "one-half per cent." Port Tax applied to goods imported and exported through the Danube and seaports of Roumania have been increased.

The Department of Overseas Trade announces that Col. Harold Woods, O.B.E., has taken up the duties of Commercial Secretary (Grade II.) for Turkey, in succession to Captain C. H. Courthope Monroe, resigned.

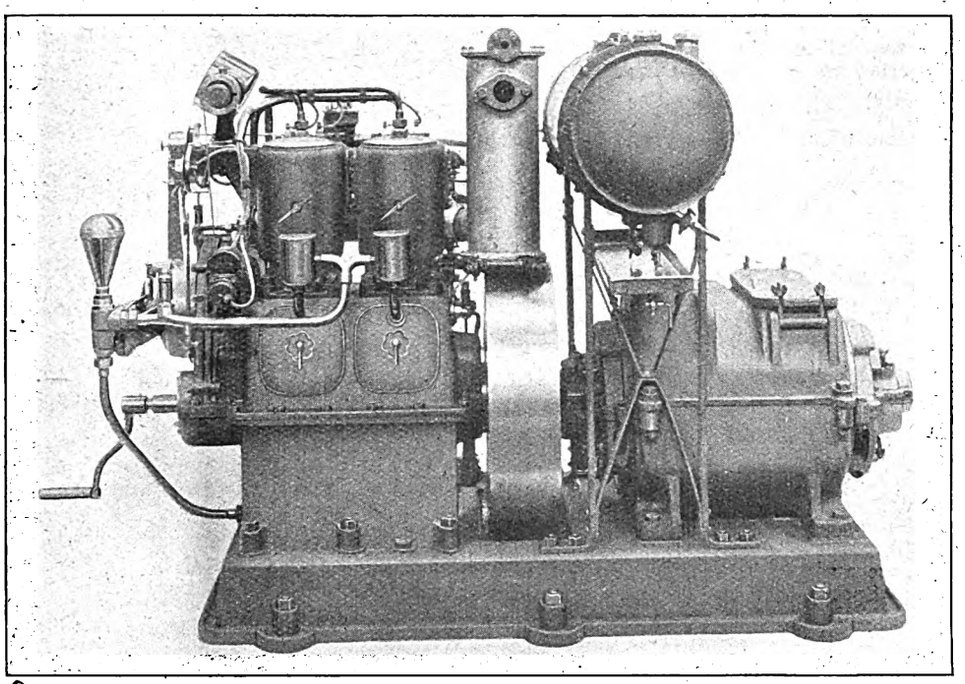
A New Electric Lighting Set.

Some brief particulars of a new oil-engine-driven electric lighting set, for which Messrs. A. G. Mumford, Ltd., are responsible, may be of interest to my readers, particularly those in the Near East and India. The engine is of the two-cylinder type, and the capacity of the set is 10 kilowatts at 105 volts. The cylinders are 5 in. in bore by 6½ in. stroke, and the running rate is 900 revolutions per minute. The dynamo is by Messrs. Crompton and Co., Ltd., and the engine and the dynamo rest on a bed plate on which are also the fuel tanks, silencer, and circulating pump. The advantage of this is obvious, for all that is required for the set to be ready for operation is to connect up with a water supply and an exhaust pipe. The crank chamber is made of cast iron, and in the lower half of it are the crank shaft bearings, which are of gunmetal, lined with white metal, and are adjustable. In order to reduce vibration, four steel balance weights are fitted to the crank shaft, while the utilisation of a special fibre for the construction of the cam shaft gear wheel assures almost silent running. On each side of the crank case are inspection doors, which permit the ready removal of the connecting rods and pistons. The forced lubrication of the bearings is accomplished by a plunger pump, which is attached to a lower oil sump bolted on the crank chamber. On the under side of the oil sump is a water jacket, and the circulating water is drawn through it on the way to the main cylinders.

The firm's patented type of vaporiser is used. The fuel is drawn in with a small quantity of air to the exhaust-heated vaporiser, and an automatic air valve of a special type regulates the extra cold air. A needle valve coupled with the throttle regulates the fuel, and adjustments are provided, enabling the easy regulation of the fuel. The plunger type of circulating water pump is used, this being due to the high suction lift that is required, and it is driven from a crank disc on the end of the cam shaft. Oil is supplied to the crank pin and to the gudgeon pin of the pump by a centrifugal oiling arrangement. Two magnetos effect the ignition of the charge, each cylinder being fitted with two plugs. An impulse coupling is fitted to one of the magnetos, which with the special type of relief valve fitted to the cylinder renders particularly easy the starting of the engine. To facilitate starting a simple compression release arrangement is fitted, comprising a non-return valve, which is so arranged that it can make a tight joint on the cylinder when screwed up by a sleeve. This valve, when it is slightly unscrewed, relieves the pressure on the compression stroke, but closes during the suction stroke, and prevents the addition to the mixture of any additional air. These engines have a special arrangement of exhaust by-pass and throttle fitted, enabling the heat of the vaporiser to be regulated. The capacity of the paraffin tank is sufficient for six hours' running.



TWO-CYLINDER PARAFFIN LIGHTING SET.

A Powder Mixer Sifter Mixer.

Those of my readers who are interested in mixing machines may like to have some particulars of Young's Powder Mixer Sifter Mixer, the manufacturers of which are Messrs. Young's Patent Hygienic Bin Company. The machine is fitted with a hopper over its whole length, and this enables the base to be laid in the hopper and the ingredients to be sprinkled on top. The batch is fed through a grid, which pulverises any lumps of chemical, on to the brush, and is then brushed through a sieve which can be fitted with any desired type of mesh. The sifted material falls into the mixing chamber, where it is thoroughly mixed by a specially designed helical gear and beater arms, and it can be entirely discharged through a simply operated flap. Special advantages of the machine are that the hopper hingeing allows the removal of both sieve and brush in a vertical position, and that when the brush has completed its function it can instantaneously be released and by means of a handle a sluice can be closed, permitting the hopper to be recharged whilst the mixing chamber is in operation.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Firm and Active.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended August 17, state:—

The futures market has been fairly active, and has secured a substantial advance during the week. The firmness of our market must be attributed to speculative purchases induced by the strength of the American markets and by the Government purchases; commercial houses have taken very little interest. The Government have continued their purchases, buying 300 to 400 bales daily, for which they have paid $\frac{3}{4}$ below November for Fully Good Fair Sakellarides and the price of November contracts for Fully Good Fair to Good Sakellarides. Owing to the existing trade depression, the advance has so far left spinners apathetic; the demand from abroad, for either old or new crops, has been poor. This week's receipts amount to 1,742 krs., and the total since September 1 now stands at 6,637,196 krs. Exports have this week amounted to 49,542 krs., and the stock stands at 903,919 krs., against 951,719 krs. a week ago and 1,524,801 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—The Minet el Bassal Market has continued quiet this week, and no improvement in the demand is to be noted as yet from spinners. Sales amount to about 3,800 bales, of which we estimate 2,700 bales Sakellarides, 1,100 bales Uppers, and a few odd bales of White, but of the Sakellarides the Government has bought about 1,150 B/s from Fully Good Fair to Fully Good Fair to Good. The first arrivals of Upper Egypt cotton have been put on the market. The cotton is, of course, high-grade and of quite good staple for such early picked cotton, but it is not possible to form an opinion on a few early lots.

Sakellarides.—The medium and good grades have been in most demand, low qualities being still neglected. Prices of spot against contracts are generally easier.

Uppers.—All styles have been dealt in. Spot prices generally are considerably easier, especially in high grades, and there is more disposition to sell what remains of the old crop in view of the new cotton which is beginning to arrive.

Brown and White are neglected, and only a few bales of White are reported. Spot prices are generally easier for both growths, but markedly so in Brown in sympathy with Uppers. The demand for these growths is at present very small.

The Crop.—Nothing of note is reported. Water supply is ample. In certain districts of Lower Egypt the crop is said to be slightly backward. The Government issued on the 11th inst. its second report of this year's acreage, showing 1,194,000 feddans for Lower Egypt and 394,100 feddans for Upper Egypt, making a total of 1,588,100 feddans for the whole of Egypt; this is an increase of 128,078 feddans over its first estimate.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Inquiry Improving.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended August 22:—

A fair inquiry has been maintained during the past week, and some slight hardening in the basis of all qualities has taken place, the quotations of all grades of Sakel being raised 15 points, and those of upper and brown 10 points. The medium Sakel grades have furnished the greater portion of the demand, cotton ranging from 70 to 100 on November contracts being much sought after. As pointed out last week, the local selection of the above-mentioned style is now poor, and spinners are beginning to be faced with the alternative of either buying higher grades or sending orders out to Alexandria for c.i.f. cotton.

A moderate amount of business has been done in uppers, but spinners naturally limit their takings in this growth to the lowest possible extent in view of the comparatively cheap offers for new crop shipments. Sudan varieties have been in rather better request, and several lots of Tokar Sakel have been placed at prices ranging from 17$\frac{3}{8}$d. to 18$\frac{1}{4}$d. The estimated sales for the week amount to 2,500 bales, against 4,700 previously reported. Sudan sales total 730 bales. Fully good fair Sakel to-day 16.45d.

An industrial exhibition, comprising the products and manufactures of various Turkish provinces, is to be held at Broussa under the auspices of the Turkish Government from September 11 to the end of October

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

Market Position Unchanged.

The Manchester cotton trade review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended August 25 states:—

Once again there is no change to report with regard to this market. Operations remain limited and the tone weak. Most of the offers received from abroad are on a price basis which is far too low, and negotiations fail to raise them to the point at which business can be done.

Yarn.—Prices continue very irregular, but without quotable change on the week. There has been no increase in the amount of business passing either in American or Egyptian, and the market for the former remains in a very depressed state. Some relief is anticipated from the annual Oldham holidays which commence next week; many firms will close down for a fortnight in addition to the usual half-time working during the rest of the month.

Cloth.—A very poor week has been experienced in practically all sections. Shippers to Turkey and the Levant have been quietly picking up stock lots at cheap prices, but these are usually only small quantities. The principal foreign outlets have been very disappointing, and dealers abroad are undoubtedly only purchasing to meet immediate requirements.

Raw Cotton.—Prices have fluctuated somewhat, and the market, generally speaking, is unsettled. The weather reports from the United States have been a little more favourable, but there appears small prospect of the total crop exceeding the estimates. The news from Egypt continues favourable. Closing prices are as follows:—American Fully Middling, 15.49; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 16.45.

CONSTANTINOPLE MARKET FOR PARAFFIN WAX.

The annual consumption of paraffin wax in Constantinople is between 1,000 and 2,000 sacks, of which 75 per cent. is supplied by American firms and the remainder by Roumania. Paraffin is used here (says an American Consular report) mainly in the manufacture of wax tapers for religious purposes, very little being taken by ship chandlers for supplying vessels touching at this port.

The trade in paraffin wax on the Constantinople market has declined greatly since 1921. During 1920 and 1921 approximately 600 tons of this article were shipped to Russia by way of Constantinople, while during the same period Roumania and Bulgaria took a total of 700 tons. However, Russia and Roumania are now again able to supply their own requirements for paraffin. In Bulgaria an American company has established warehouses and stocks at the seaport of Bourgas, whence paraffin is distributed to the rest of the country.

The prospects for the future development of the trade in paraffin in Turkey appear to be good. The new tariff regulations, recently promulgated by the Turkish authorities, subject candles to an import duty of 60 piastres per kilo. It is believed that under the protection of this high duty a Turkish candle industry will develop, which in turn will cause an increased demand for paraffin wax. With regard to candles, it is worthy of note that there is a preference locally for the French type, which are manufactured from a mixture of paraffin and ceresin.

THE GREEK STATE RAILWAY POSITION.

A Serious Outlook.

The physical and financial conditions of the Government-owned railways of Greece are a matter of considerable concern to the State, as revealed by discussions in the Greek Press during recent months (says an American commerce report). Track and equipment are in poor condition and the traffic is insignificant compared with what it should be. Shortage of labour and repair material, added to intensive traffic during and immediately after the war, left Greece, like other nations involved in the war, with a demoralised railway system.

The poverty of the Greek State has prohibited any except emergency remedies, and replacements have been almost out of the question. Earnings in pre-war years have been replaced by deficits that have resulted from costly working of inefficient locomotives, from increased wages, from higher repair costs, and from expensive track maintenance on low roadbeds that are subject to frequent washout or overflow.

Cost of Reconstruction.

Makeshift repairs have been made to roadbed and track, but extensive permanent repairs are greatly needed, particularly in elevation of roadbed. Many bridges should be strengthened or replaced; decayed sleepers are also in need of replacement. Greece does not produce rolling stock or other equipment, and imports have been delayed. Urgent temporary repairs needed to bring the lines and rolling stock up to date are estimated to cost 80,000,000 drachmæ.

The State railways, having 1.44-metre gauge and a total length of 1,275 kilometres, comprise the following lines: Piræus-Athens-Salonika-Ghevgeli (Yugoslav frontier), 598 kilometres; branch lines, 46 kilometres; Salonika-Monastir, 183 kilometres; and Salonika-Dedeagatch, 448 kilometres. The roadbed on both the Salonika-Monastir line and the Piræus-Ghevgeli line is too low in many places; this is particularly true of the Athens-Salonika and the Salonika-Ghevgeli sections, over which runs the Orient Express that links Athens with Western Europe. There are frequent washouts, at times occasioning interruptions to traffic of ten days' duration and necessitating repairs involving considerable expense. It has been said that the only remedy for this condition is to change the route of the line.

The reinforcement of the Athens-Salonika-Ghevgeli line by replacing the worn rails of 34 kilos weight per metre with new 40-kilo rails and by replacing the decayed wooden sleepers with steel sleepers weighing 70 kilos each has been projected, thus allowing the use of heavier engines and more economical maintenance of way. Steel sleepers in use on the lines from Salonika to Monastir and Dedeagatch show a saving of 20 per cent. in labour alone on upkeep, and are expected to last 50 years, compared with seven years for wooden sleepers. It is estimated that 600,000 steel sleepers would be necessary for the line from Athens to Ghevgeli; the estimated cost of these improvements is 123,000,000 drachmæ.

Inadequate Rolling Stock.

In the autumn of 1922 there were 152 locomotives, 116 tenders, 242 passenger cars, 1,682 closed freight cars, 870 open freight cars, and three cranes in use. Nine of these locomotives, however, were left in Asia Minor, and 20 per cent. of the remainder and 30 per cent. of the passenger cars were under repair. The locomotives are small and of old design, except a few bought in the United States and some "armistice" engines turned over to Greece out of the deliveries from Bulgaria and Germany. The cars are small and badly worn.

This rolling stock is insufficient for the carriage of articles of prime necessity. Merchandise worth approximately 15,000,000 drachmæ was reported to be waiting for transportation near railroad warehouses, exposed to the weather in November, 1922. An added burden is put on the railroads by the need of supplies for the enormous and increasing numbers of refugees; some cars have been turned over exclusively for the carriage of refugee supplies from Salonika. Some efforts have been made to secure new equipment, but the results have been of little consequence. New and larger locomotives and cars are needed, provided tracks and bridges are strengthened.

Freight rates and passenger fares were increased several times during 1922; in October of that year rates were raised 75 per cent. and fares 50 per cent., the purpose being to increase rates in proportion to operating costs. In spite of this great advance, the returns have not produced sufficient income, and the operation of the Government railroads continues to be a heavy burden on the State Treasury, although the deficit for 1922 was expected to be smaller than in 1921. The deficit for the latter year was 10,824,000 drachmæ, in comparison with a deficit of 2,180,298 drachmæ in 1919 and a net surplus of 250,736 drachmæ in 1914.

Various efforts have been made to secure a loan for railway rehabilitation. To this end, a legislative decree was published on April 3, providing for the contracting of a loan. Under its provisions, the State railways must deposit a portion of their gross income from fares and freight each month with the National Bank of Greece. The portion may be as much as 15 per cent., and is to be fixed in each case by the Cabinet. The money is solely for the service of a loan to be contracted for indispensable technical works, materials, improvements of lines, and renewal of rolling stock. All details of the loan are subject to the approval of the Minister of Communications.

In addition to the foregoing measures, the Greek Government for a year or more has been negotiating with various English, French, and American capitalists for the taking over of all the State railways, either by purchase or by concession for operation, with a view to improving existing lines and building new ones. No definite results have been announced as yet.

Proposed Reforms.

The collapse of the Greek State railways can be avoided only by extensive administrative, labour, financial, and operating reforms, according to the Economist of Athens of May 26. In order to accomplish this most quickly, effectively, and with least expense, the Economist suggests that the greatest efforts and funds be concentrated on the Salonika-Ghevgeli section as the shortest and most usable route for traffic from Central Europe to the Levant and to the Orient, via Port Said.

At present this traffic has the choice of three main rail routes to the Mediterranean—via Italy to Brindisi; via Serbia and Greece to Piræus or to Salonika; or via Bulgaria and Turkey to Constantinople. Of the three peninsular routes, that by way of Greece offers the shortest sea passage to Port Said.

When the Larissa Line (Thessaly) was started in 1890, Greek and other experts believed it would be an important link in the trans-European railroad system to the Levant and, via Port Said, to the Orient (the Constantinople-Baghdad railroad had not then been built)—involving less time than the Italian route. This belief was based on a supposed average railway speed of 50 kilometres per hour by rail and of 20 kilometres by ship. The actual Greek train speed, however, has proved to be only 26 kilometres, and the Greek passenger-boat service does not compare with the Italian. The dream for Piræus as an outlet for Central European trade was not realisable.

The Economist proposes: (1) That the same plans be now transferred to Salonika, which is only 80 kilometres from the Serbian border and nearer to Port Said by 353 kilometres than is Brindisi; (2) that the Salonika-Ghevgeli railway be improved to permit greater train speed—the Serbian trains already maintain a speed of 28 kilometres per hour, and would probably increase it if co-operation from the Greek line were effective; (3) that the other Greek railroads, existing or to be constructed, be organised as subsidiaries of the Salonika-Ghevgeli line and as feeders to the port of Salonika; (4) that the port itself be developed to take care of practically all maritime traffic in Northern Greece, and particularly of the transit traffic to and from Central Europe; (5) finally, that Greek shipowners be encouraged to co-operate by making their service from Salonika to Port Said equal or superior to that of the Italian fleet from Brindisi. It is hoped, by these measures, to secure and hold the greater part of Central European transit traffic with the Orient and reduce the danger of its loss to Italy through Brindisi or through the projected outlet ports on the Albanian coast.

The foregoing résumé has been confined to those railways now actually owned by the Greek Government. There is a possibility, however, that the State may shortly be further burdened with the operation of the Spap line (Société Pirée-Athènes-Peloponèse)—a privately owned railway system on the Peloponnesian Peninsula, whose privilege of exploitation expires in September, 1923. The line was taken over for operation by the Government as a war emergency and afterwards returned to the owners.

AGRICULTURAL EXHIBITION AT ADANA.

The Acting British High Commissioner at Constantinople reports that an "International Exhibition for the Sale of Agricultural Products" will be held at Adana during the month of November. Both agricultural produce and farming implements are to be shown, and foreign interests are invited to exhibit agricultural machinery and farming implements, and space is being reserved to enable them to do so. Further details may be obtained by United Kingdom firms interested on application to the Department of Overseas Trade (Exhibitions and Fairs Division), 35, Old Queen Street, London, S.W.1.

BRITISH CLAIMS AGAINST TURKEY.

Prime Minister's Statement.

Sir Edwin Stockton, M.P., questioned the Government during the past session in regard to the settlement of British claims against Turkey under the Lausanne Treaty. Just before the House rose, the Prime Minister indicated, in the course of a statement, that the sum of £T5,000,000 had been placed at the disposal of the Allies for the purpose of meeting claims. This answer, however, left some points uncertain; and Sir Edwin wrote to the Prime Minister asking what other Allies participated in this sum, what was the British share, and whether claims against Turkey were the only ones which could be put forward in respect of our share of this £5,000,000. Sir Edwin has now received the following letter:—

Dear Sir Edwin Stockton,—The Prime Minister has asked me to write to you in order to give you the information for which you asked in your letter of the 4th inst.

The Allies who will participate in the sum of £5,000,000 Turkish in gold are Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and Roumania. It is anticipated that the claims of Japan and Roumania will be exceedingly small. The Allies concerned are discussing an agreement whereby a Commission will be set up to distribute the sums available between the claimants in proportion to their claims as assessed by the Commission.

The Commission would consider all reparation claims against Turkey for direct loss and damage during the war (i.e., from August 1, 1914, up to the coming into force of the Treaty with Turkey) and also similar claims for loss and damage caused by the fire at Smyrna, in respect of which compensation has not been received from insurance companies.

It is quite true that the sums available will only enable the Commission to pay a percentage of the claims received, but the British Government were strongly impressed with the futility of trying to obtain promises on paper to pay large sums which the poverty-stricken Government of present-day Turkey would certainly be unable to carry out. On the opinion of the Government the claimants will be far better off by having a large sum, which is definitely available and in the hands of the Allies, set aside for their claims, than they would have been if they had received a theoretical right to obtain full compensation from Turkey. Past experience with Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria, not to mention Germany, seems to show conclusively that in such cases from the point of view of the claimants a bird in the hand is worth any number of birds in the bush.—Yours truly (signed) R. P. H. Gowers.

GOOD CYPRUS HARVEST.

A report received by the Imperial Ottoman Bank from Nicosia, dated July 28, states:—

The 1923 harvest is one of the best on record, with the exception of the carob crop, which is estimated at 25 to 30 per cent. below that of last year. The commercial situation shows no signs of improvement.

This year's wheat harvest in Algeria is estimated at 10,000,000 quintals, compared with nearly 5,000,000 quintals last year.

THE ROUMANIAN HARVEST.

Bucharest, August 20.

The harvest of wheat, rye, and barley was practically finished by the end of July, and the crops have been, generally speaking, fairly good, both as regards quality and quantity. In the Banat it is said that the wheat gave an average of 4,000 kilogrammes per hectare, a figure which has not been reached since 1886. The maize crop in the Old Kingdom is expected to be good, but in Transylvania it is suffering from drought. There has been no rain in that province for five weeks. The potato and beetroot crops are good, but the tree fruit crops are not up to the average.

The export tax on maize has been reduced by a law published on August 5 from 30,000 to 20,000 lei per waggon of 10 tons.

SMYRNA FRUIT REPORT.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, report as follows under date August 11:—

The estimated arrivals of sultanas in the Smyrna market since the opening of the season amount to 125 tons, and the sales to date are 88 tons. Quotations f.o.b. Smyrna are: "Beta," 53s. cwt.; "Gamma," 49s. cwt. The market has opened quietly. Arrivals are not expected to become general until towards the end of the month, when slightly lower prices are likely to rule. First arrivals of figs are due on the market on the 20th inst.

A later report, dated August 20, states that the arrivals of sultanas on the Smyrna market up to August 18 amounted to 600 tons. Prices are: 1, 49s. cwt.; 2, 46s.; 3, 43s. Arrivals from Yerli districts started coming forward this week. The fruit is of very bright colour, but this will not be maintained in the case of later arrivals. Per contra, fruit should show better development. The market is quiet. Consuming countries are slow in passing orders, probably relying on the usual volume of unsold consignments. Shippers, however, are few in number, and show a disposition to act with considerable reserve, calculating on consuming markets being bound to come in to buy sooner or later. Prices are reaching an attractive level from which a reaction may follow.

POOR GREEK CURRANT CROP.

The yield of this year's Greek currant crop is expected to be considerably below the normal. Mr. P. A. Burlumi, of Messrs. Burlumi and Co., in an interview with a representative of THE NEAR EAST, stated that the crop is estimated at 85-90,000 tons, or about 20 per cent. less than last year. "Fortunately for the consumer," he added, "the exchange is so greatly in favour of this country, and prices, in spite of the insufficient crop, are much lower than last year. While at the beginning of last season the quotation for the provincial growth was 55s. per cwt. f.o.b. Greece, the price recorded to-day for the same growth of new crop is only 43s. f.o.b.

"Stocks in this country are very small at the present time, and, of course, the growers, having such a reduced crop, will insist on higher prices as soon as they cover their immediate needs by the sale of part of their crop. Shipments will be later than usual this year, the crop being rather late. The reason for the indifferent crop is that peronosporos has done considerable damage in the vineyards."

SUDAN PRODUCE.

The following extracts are taken from the report of the Central Economic Board of the Sudan Government for June:—

Dura and Dukhn.

Blue Nile Province.—Dura brought into Moradas during May and June in ardebs of 300 rotls (135 kilos): Wad Medani, 17,235; Hassa Heissa, 19,794. A good deal of propaganda work has been done calling the attention of cultivators to the necessity of keeping smutty heads out of their dura and a large number of trial plots will be sown with dura treated with copper sulphate to prevent smut. Very good progress has been made with the erection of the new cleaning plants at Hassa Heissa and Wad Medani; the former is now ready and the latter is expected to be finished before the end of July.

White Nile Province.—707 ardebs of 384 rotls (173 kilos.) were exported from Dueim during the month and 35 ardebs from Kosti.

Kordofan Province.—132 ardebs of 420 rotls (189 kilos) were sold in El Obeid market during the month, the average price being £E1.200 m/ms. per ardeb.

Sesame.

Fung Province.—May and June: 226 tons of sesame were exported by rail from Makwar River siding during May.

Kordofan Province.—Red sesame sold in El Obeid market for £E1.450 m/ms. per ardeb of 330 rotls (149 kilos).

Ground Nuts.

Kordofan Province.—161 ardebs of ground nuts were sold in El Obeid Market at an average price of 650 m/ms. per ardeb of 210 rotls (94 kilos).

Upper Nile Province.—129 tons of ground nuts were exported during the month.

Dates.

Dongola Province.—There is every prospect of an excellent date crop this year as the trees throughout the province are bearing well. The chief fear now is damage by heavy rains. Average price of Barakawi dates per 100 kilos was £E1.400 m/ms.

Halfa Province.—The crops are reported most excellent and abundant. Market prices were as follows (per sack of 140—145 kilos):—Barakawi, £E2.200; Gondeila, £E3.000; Gargoda, £E1.900.

Reuter's Athens correspondent reports that a contract for the Piræus harbour works has been practically concluded with a group of French firms, including that of the famous steel works Schneider and Co. and the Régie Générale des Chemins de Fer.

THE EGYPTIAN TOURIST TRAFFIC.

Suez Harbour Works.

Although it is difficult to form more than an approximate idea of the total number of tourists who come to Egypt for, or during, the winter season (says Mr. E. Homan Mulock, British Commercial Agent for Egypt, in a review of Egyptian shipping), it is estimated that, thanks partly to the efforts of the Egypt Promotion Association, and partly to the attraction afforded by the wonderful discoveries at Luxor, the total for the 1922-23 season will amount to about 12,000, and constitute an increase on the 1921-22 numbers. These figures are, however, very much below those of pre-war seasons, owing partly to the absence of tourists from Austria, Germany and Russia, and partly to the fact that those from the United Kingdom and the United States of America are not favoured by the exchange in Egypt. Tourist traffic has been considerably facilitated and fostered by the enterprise shown by the White Star and Cunard Lines in establishing their own agencies in this country for the duration of the current season, and by arranging for giant liners such as the Mauretania, Homeric, and others, to call at Alexandria.

Since the cancellation in June, 1922, of the original contract awarded to a Dutch firm in October, 1918, for the extension of Suez harbour, including an oiling basin to accommodate seven oil-tankers simultaneously, the completion of the scheme has been in abeyance. The Government has now decided to carry out a large part of the works en regie, with its own staff and material.

GERMANY AND TRADE ROUTES TO THE EAST.

The possible orientation of Germany towards the East is discussed in an article in the "Journal of Commerce," which points out that while Germany continues feverishly to reconstruct her mercantile marine, "there are many people in Germany who no longer accept the theory that the future of the country 'lies on the water,' but that it is to be sought rather in the Near East, which is the gateway to the Far East, and that, therefore, the trend of German policy must follow that direction. The same applies to all the Central European States. There is a close economic connection between Central Europe and the Near East, the one, in fact, complementing the other.

"From the economic point of view, the Near East offers many advantages to Central Europe, and not the least important are those afforded by the Black Sea district. . . . At present the whole of the Black Sea district is suffering from the effects of the war, but these will be overcome, and when the normal processes of trade are resumed Russia will be exporting instead of importing, as at present, the surplus of her agricultural produce, and Asia Minor, to say nothing of Bulgaria and Roumania, will be deriving the benefits of the methods of intensive cultivation which are now gradually being adopted. This increased production will very largely find its market in Central Europe in exchange for manufactured goods.

"The natural route along which this exchange of commodities will take place is the Danube and the Black Sea. Already improvements are being made on the Danube with these developments in view. River craft with a larger carrying capacity are being built, and as soon as the volume of traffic increases, transportation facilities on sea-going lighters will be arranged from the mouth of the Danube to Bulgarian ports, Constantinople, and Odessa. Plans are in contemplation, and even in progress, for making the larger tributaries of the Danube,—the Save, Drave, Theiss, and Moldau—navigable over long stretches, and the Rhine-Danube and Elbe-Danube canals will contribute their respective quotas of traffic. This Danube-Black Sea water-way will provide Central Europe with an East means of access to the Near East, and the facilities could be increased by a canal connection between the Black Sea and the Caspian, whence the heart of Asia could be reached."

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

African and Eastern Trade Corporation.

The report of the African and Eastern Trade Corporation, Ltd., for the year 1922 states that the profit was £739,774, after taking into account the adjustment of excess profits duty so far accomplished, and after allowing for the usual depreciation on property and the writing down of all stocks to current market values. Buildings, steamers and boats, etc., have, as usual, been kept up out of revenue. After payment of the preference dividends for the year and the provision of £200,000 for further depreciation on stocks, the credit balance remaining is £452,456. In April last an interim dividend of 4 per cent. was paid on the ordinary shares, thus leaving available for further distribution £347,425.

During the past year trade conditions in the world generally have been disappointing, and the immediate outlook continues to be uncertain. The directors have consequently deemed it prudent to transfer £300,000 from the reserve fund, in order to make what they believe to be ample provision for further contingencies. The general depression during 1922 has affected adversely the trading results of some of the subsidiary companies belonging to the corporation, and consequent upon this the directors have thought it desirable to reduce further the book values of the investments in those companies, and for this purpose have appropriated £670,000 from the general reserve. In the accounts provision has also been made of £250,000 to meet the claims on the corporation during the next three years for income-tax on the excess profits duty repayments, so far received by the corporation and credited to the subsidiary companies. After adjusting these amounts the reserve fund, including insurance and depreciation funds, now stands at £2,547,684. The directors now recommend a final dividend for the year of 4 per cent., less tax, payable October 1, making 8 per cent., leaving to be carried forward £242,394.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Italy and Greece.

By allowing her native excitability to run riot over the Epirus murders Italy has done herself and friendly Powers the gravest disservice. She is a country of nearly thirty-nine million inhabitants; Greece has less than six millions. The moral responsibility of the Greek Government for the crime committed in Greek territory was established, and the reparation that Italy was entitled and in a position to exact would have lost nothing from being enforced in a deliberate and dignified manner. No one has been impressed by the excessive vindictiveness of the ultimatum, by the hasty occupation of a Greek island, or, still less, by the utterly unjustifiable bombardment of an undefended town. Such acts might have been expected of one Central American State wishing to seize an advantage in its quarrel with another, but are quite unworthy of a Great Power which shares with other Great Powers the obligation of setting an example to the more backward countries of Europe of correct international procedure. The murder of the Italian military mission engaged in the delimitation of the Greco-Albanian frontier was a crime only too typical of conditions in the Balkans. As the nationals of a European Great Power were the victims—apart altogether from their employment on behalf of the Council of Ambassadors—it was most desirable that the public sense of Europe should show its indignation at the outrage, and take the most effective means to eradicate from the Balkans the lawlessness of which the murder was the outcome. Italy, however, has chosen to act herself more Balkanico, and for the murder of an Italian general and four others has proceeded to kill a handful of Greek refugees in the town of Corfu. The Italian Government can hardly fail to realise that, while by such action it may pander to national excitement, it has lost caste in the eyes of the world.

The Balkans on Guard.

The chief sufferer from the Italian Government's mistake will be Italy. She will learn that Europe is not still in 1914 and that she herself is not Germany. She has played her Balkan cards badly since the War, and she may never retrieve this blunder. In the rôle of a Great Power there was much to be said for her occupying a special position in the Balkans, and by economic co-operation assisting in their reconstruction. By her handling of her quarrel with Greece she has shown that she can set no example to a Balkan State, and has merely proved herself a greater danger to the general peace of Europe than any of them through being possessed of greater military and naval strength. There is, therefore, only one course for the Balkan States to adopt, and that is to safeguard themselves against Italian bullying and aggression by forming a confederation whose combined strength Italy will have to respect. The bombardment of Corfu should provide an effective stimulus to this end; but first of all there must be for each Balkan State a certain amount of setting one's house in order before confederation can be carried through.

The Komitaji Curse.

The Italian Press makes a great mistake in supposing that the British attitude to the Greco-Italian episode has been coloured by partiality for Greece. On the contrary, it has been a blow to Great Britain to find herself in disagreement with Italy. Nowhere does the crime of which the Italian military mission have been the victims arouse greater indignation than in Great Britain, and the British Government would not have hesitated to endorse all proper steps to secure full reparation for Italy. The Italian ultimatum, however, was not the work of a Government concerned to uphold the dignity of the Great Powers in dealing with a lawless outrage committed in a small country. It contained, rather, the concentrated venom of years of hatred and deliberately aimed at the utmost humiliation that could be imposed upon Greece. But if the ultimatum was a mistake, the bombardment of Corfu was a deliberate crime the first effect of which is to place the murder of the Italians in Epirus for the moment in the background. So incredible is it that Italy should make such a blunder, that there is a tendency to imagine that her action is part of a scheme to carry out imperialist designs in the Adriatic and the Mediterranean. These misgivings need not worry Europe, for, sooner or later, it will be possible to appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober. In the meantime the League of Nations must not lose sight of the root cause of the whole trouble—the connivance of Balkan Governments in the existence of frontier komitaji bands. This curse of the Balkans must now be dealt with finally. The terms that Italy would impose on Greece by way of reparation may appeal to the self-glorification of a petty mind; but Europe should see to it that her say in the matter will aim not at the humiliation of Greece, but at her betterment and at the eradication for all time from all Balkan countries of what is a standing menace to the peace of the world.

Removing a Reproach.

The good sense of the Balkan States, we may hope, will have been so aroused by the Greco-Italian episode that they will not wait for a lead from outside to deal with this komitaji curse. Far too long has the facile habit been indulged in of allowing official policy to be stultified by unofficial acts. Officially every country is at peace with its neighbour and would resent the insinuation that it desired any other than peaceful relations. But whether from indifference, from incompetence or of set purpose, no Balkan Government seems to be sufficiently exercised over irregularities that are committed by its nationals--not always unofficial persons—in connection with minorities or frontier questions. If there have been malpractices in Western Thrace or Epirus, there is no reason to suppose that they have been deliberately inspired by the Athens Government; but it would be idle to imagine that the latter is ignorant of what is taking place. Again, when the Yugoslav Government is accused by its political opponents of killing off its Macedonian subjects in South-Eastern Serbia, whatever has lent colour to the charge is probably due to the people on the spot—officials they may well be—acting on their own initiative, but certain of not being checked nor reprimanded from Belgrade. Sooner or later retribution will follow; it may take the form of foreign complications, as in the case of Greece's policy in Northern Epirus, or it may be as a weapon forged for political opponents at home. The game is not worth the candle. If a Government is looking for trouble, let it court it openly; if it claims to be peaceful, let it make sure that its nationals, and above all its officials, keep the peace. It does not seem to be sufficiently realised that it is in the main this irresponsible action of officials and the existence of komitaji bands that have caused the Balkans to be a byword in Europe.

The Policy for Greece.

There can be no question as to the course of action that Greece ought to adopt in the face of Italy's threats. She will be wise to accept all the demands made of her, with the single exception of the monetary payment, which is as far beyond her capacity to pay as it is preposterous on the part of Italy to make the demand. Submission entails less humiliation, in view of the manifest severity of the terms, if it is made at once without quibbling. She should have nothing to fear from the presence of an Italian officer on the commission of inquiry, and she can have no objection to imposing the death penalty on the murderers, if and when they are captured. As for compensation, she can leave the amount to be paid to the decision of the League of Nations, as it is unlikely that Italy will continue to flout the public opinion of Europe by insisting upon her original sum. For the rest, the episode must serve Greece as a warning that she must lose no time in setting her house in order, in addition to the immediate suppression of komitaji bands. She knows now the extent of the Italian menace, and can only hope to safeguard herself in the future by means of a Balkan federation. To this end she must be prepared to make sacrifices to ensure permanent agreement with Yugoslavia and Bulgaria, so that the three countries and Roumania may form for purposes of foreign policy a single unit, speaking and acting for an aggregate of forty million people.

Britain and Turkey.

Great Britain has been fortunate in having Sir Charles Harington in command of the troops in Constantinople during the critical period that has followed the Turkish victories in Asia Minor. To his tact and vision the success of the Mudania Conference was mainly due, and since then he has shown even higher qualities of statesmanship in steering clear of the many pitfalls that have been provided by the anomalous situation in Constantinople. He has been charged in some quarters, no doubt, for having displayed too much complacency in the face of Turkish aggression, but we imagine that few people in full possession of all the facts, and realising the trend of affairs in the Near East, will hold that any other policy would have been equally successful in bringing about immediate peace in the Near East. As things are, it is an asset to both countries that relations between Great Britain and Turkey are good, and for this fact the thanks of the nation are owed in no stinted measure to General Harington.

Prohibition in Turkey.

It would be surprising if Turkey found in actual practice that Prohibition was as easy a matter as the first Angora Assembly imagined. When it became a question of applying to Constantinople the dry régime which had proved simple to introduce in Anatolia under war conditions, the Assembly began to learn that there were more things in Europe and the rest of the earth than were dreamt of in its philosophy. Now that the war incentive has been removed, new Turkey will discover that unexpected complications are apt to crop up even nearer home. Considerable sympathy will be felt with her over this question of Prohibition. If any country adopts it, it ought to be Turkey, with the moral force of the Koran behind her. As a practical measure, however, it would call for far greater conviction on the subject in the public mind and a more efficient administration than is likely to be met with in Turkey for some time to come. In these circumstances a compromise is clearly the wisest solution for the present. All honour is due to Hoja Mussa Kiazim, Minister of Religious Affairs, if it be true that he has resigned in protest against the changed attitude on the subject of Prohibition; his action is a credit to his country, and suggests that principles and convictions may yet play their part in new Turkey.

Egypt and the Hejaz.

It is satisfactory to know that the Egyptian and Hejaz Governments are trying to adjust the quarrel which arose over the dispatch of the Holy Carpet to Mecca. At best the incident was a storm in a teacup. Egypt has been accustomed in the past to send a medical mission with the Mahmal, but this year, owing partly to a misunderstanding on the part of the Hejaz and partly to an excess of zeal among the Egyptian officials connected with the pilgrimage, the Hejaz Government took exception to the presence of a larger medical mission than usual, and refused to allow it to proceed. The Egyptian Government thereupon withdrew the whole pilgrimage contingent from Egypt and with it the grant in money that it has hitherto contributed annually in connection with the pilgrimage. It was obviously out of place that such a quarrel should last, and the two Governments have shown their good sense in reopening negotiations on the subject.

Irak and Persia.

The mediation of Sir Percy Loraine and the tact of King Faisal promise to effect a settlement of a matter which is embarrassing both to Persia and Irak. A number of Persian priests at Nejef and Kerbela left Irak as a protest against the Government's action in deporting a leading Persian high priest for interfering with the elections. Arrived in Persia, they appear to have attributed their presence there as due entirely to British machinations, with a view, no doubt, to arousing wider sympathy among the Persians, with whom at present the British are not in high favour. As the incident was giving rise, quite unjustifiably, of course, to anti-British demonstrations, Sir Percy Loraine, British Minister at Teheran, went to Baghdad to discuss the subject with the Irak Government. As a result of his visit, it would appear, a deputation from King Faisal has proceeded to Kum, where the Persian ulema are staying, in order to make it possible for the latter to return to Irak. Such satisfactory progress is being made with the Irak elections since the deportation of Sheikh Mahdi al Khalisi, that it was probably not difficult to satisfy the protesting priests that they had been too precipitate in their action.

M. Rakovski.

We are reminded by a correspondent that M. Krastu Rakovski, to whose appointment as Soviet representative in London the British Government has now withdrawn its objection, was originally a Bulgarian. Born in Kotel, he was educated first in that village and later at Gabrovo, subsequently going abroad to study law and medicine. He is the great-nephew of a noted Bulgarian patriot, poet, and writer, Sava Rakovski, who prompted and organised the revolt against Turkish rule and has one of the chief streets in Sofia named after him. The father of the Soviet representative was a farmer in the Dobruja. M. Krastu Rakovski himself went to live in Roumania, and served his period of military service in that country. Early in life he adopted Socialist views, and in Roumania became a leader of the Socialists. A dispute arose at one time as to his nationality, owing to a desire on the part of the Roumanian authorities to deport him to Bulgaria; but his military service was accepted as evidence of his Roumanian nationalisation. During the War he was imprisoned in Roumania for his ultra-Socialist views, and when liberated joined the Soviets, with whom he has since worked.

The Religious Tension in India.

The news of widespread rioting during the celebration of the Muharram in Northern India does not come as a surprise, in view of the existing tension between the largest communities in the country. Logically, of course, the Hindus are not concerned, except as spectators, in what is essentially a demonstration by one Moslem sect against another, but the unfortunate thing is that the celebrants are bound by custom and tradition to work themselves into a state of religious frenzy, and logic counts for nothing when once that condition has been reached. It is clear that the United Provinces administration was prepared for trouble, and the actual disorder has been promptly suppressed, but the worst feature of such occurrences is the legacy of hate they leave behind. Three centuries ago, a European observer recorded the fact that at Agra no Hindu dare venture into the streets during the final celebrations of the Muharram, and if the recent exacerbation of feeling continues that statement may once again become true. One reads from time to time of praiseworthy local efforts towards conciliation; but so far we have heard of nothing which can be described as a national lead in that direction.

The Release of Mohamed Ali.

At this juncture exceptional interest attaches to the release of Mohamed Ali, the most determined leader of the anti-European movement among Indian Moslems, who has served the sentence of imprisonment inflicted two years ago, substantially reduced, we are glad to read, as the result of his exemplary conduct while in gaol. Of late years he has stood out as protagonist of a union between Hindus and Moslems, a union inspired by common hatred rather than by mutual respect or esteem, but his leadership was not universally popular among Hindus, and his energies were devoted mainly to the Khilafat agitation. His future action may prove to be of real importance. It is unlikely that he will retire into private life, and he may either resume his old agitation on the strength of such remnants of Moslem grievances as may have survived the settlement at Lausanne, or be drawn into the religious feud which has developed so seriously since he last appeared on the platform. Neither of these alternatives is attractive, though the latter is by far the more dangerous, and perhaps it is allowable to hope that he may decide to settle down as a constitutional politician, and work for national union on the only basis that can endure.

Old and New India.

The struggle between the Old India and the New, which is the outstanding feature of the country to-day, crops up in the most out-of-the-way places, and furnishes some extraordinary contrasts. Rajputana is the stronghold of Old India, and Udaipur is regarded as old-fashioned even in Rajputana, but the State has lately been afflicted by an outbreak of up-to-date Communism and the establishment of self-constituted authorities, which have been described not unfairly as Soviets. The Parsees of Bombay are perhaps the most enlightened community in India, progressive in politics as in commerce, but the majority of them have been driven to fury by a proposal to provide facilities for cremation, as an alternative to the traditional method of disposing of their dead by exposure to vultures, a method, by the way, which is equally repugnant to all classes of their neighbours. Udaipur claims to have suppressed its Soviets with comparatively little trouble, and the Parsees are not to have a crematorium for the present, but such incidents as these, unimportant in themselves, are still useful as reminders that the establishment of a homogeneous, self-governing democracy in India may require some little time and patience.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

The Italian Flare.

Not even in the likeliest quarters in England can you find any enthusiasm over the prospect of a possible war between Italy and Greece. Quite obviously, this generation has had enough of war and talk of war, and considers anyone leaning to such things rather a nuisance. Not that there is much spoken disapproval of Signor Mussolini's actions—we are all cynical enough now to know that one invokes the League of Nations when it is to one's own interest, and equally disregards it when convenient.

Naturally, but also without effect, the moralists and the busybodies have been up in arms at Italy's high measures. Signor Mussolini, the mode of whose access to power was never quite approved by the staid minds of this country, has given to our pacifists and "liberals" a beautiful chance of heaping abuse on him, and in the most sermonical of language they have not failed to take advantage of it. But what the ordinary Briton thinks of it all is hard to discover. He scarcely judges it from the lofty standard of justice; he knows he has not much use for the Greeks; he seems to remember Capporetto, but thinks Signor Mussolini rather a fine man, although if he is going to indulge in the monkey tricks of another war we shall have to be against Italy also! In short, the ordinary man is still incurably ignorant and of little account.

But perhaps it is not so strange that we, or rather our Press, should, as a whole, be against the sharp display of the Italian Premier. Certainly nowhere else does he find such opponents as here. Yet a moment's thought brings you to a clash of British and Italian ambitions in the Mediterranean, and if we have given up the scheme of installing ourselves. via Greece, as mistress of the Eastern Mediterranean, we are still far from disposed to acquiesce in Italian supremacy there. Signor Mussolini may be, undoubtedly is, a good Italian, but when he comes up against us he ceases—so we say—to be a good European. But we must go very carefully in thus preaching to Italy: we may want her help some day, and threat of an economic boycott is not exactly the way in which to lay the foundations of future friendship.

Ireland.

The elections in Ireland are now over, and, although the Republicans have done far better than our purblind journalists believed possible, the Treaty has in the main been endorsed by the Irish electors. This is something, but not so very much. There is nothing indisputable about the Government majority, and the President of the Free State can hardly ask the world to witness how his country supports his policy. Nearly fifty Republicans were elected, despite the application of somewhat Balkanic methods to various Republican leaders.

But we must be thankful for small mercies, and a condition of affairs in which Ireland, if still divided, is quiet and hopeful, is something so new as to be indeed refreshing. The dream of a united Ireland is still unrealised, yet, though there must be much trouble before it is brought about, the finest minds in both Ireland and England still believe in it, and are working for it.

The Increase of Unemployment.

Already the prophets of industrial woe are in full cry over the prospects of the coming winter. And the signs are certainly disquieting enough. At this moment, when normally unemployment should be at its lowest point, it is actually on the increase; orders for winter work in the factories are not coming in; and persons not given to extravagant reasoning anticipate a rise by the beginning of 1924 to two million unemployed.

We in the South do not see this problem of unemployment closely enough to make us shudder, but in the Midlands and in the North it is the despair of thousands of lives. Not much good is done by deploring, as so often we are content to do, the striking tactics of the workmen, or the greed of the employers; the capitalistic system is with us, and unless we are prepared to break it, we must make the best of it. Many people are looking to the Government to solve, or at least to alleviate, the problem, but that is an unfair attitude. The Government can indeed affect the immediate nature of the question, but to its permanent or future aspect they can make little difference. For the improvement of that we must wait for the stability of foreign markets, and we may have to wait for some time.

Anæmia in Women.

The fact was published the other day that chlorosis, the anæmia of young women, is disappearing both from Europe and America, and all sorts of satisfied, gallant articles were written in the Press about "healthier womanhood," and that kind of thing. Without any doubt at all our young women are in some ways healthier than their mothers and their grandmothers used to be—for two things, their dress generally, and their conduct sometimes, are so much more sensible—but one is never quite certain in such matters whether as much has not been lost on the swings as has been gained on the roundabouts. Our grandmothers had anæmia, they say, and sighed, and fainted; but are not our young maidens afflicted by repressed complexes and the like? Women certainly do change more than men, but travel rather in a circle than along an upward line. After all it was just these "anæmic," despised creatures of the last generation who are responsible for the incomparable superiority of our own.

The Season-Ticket Controversy.

Unpopularity was earned in many quarters by the recent amalgamation of the railway companies, and the latest proposal, to "standardise" season-tickets, is meeting with very hostile criticism. The companies, being asked to submit a standard mileage scale of rates for season tickets, did so, and the result is that, although in some cases the cost of season tickets would be reduced, in most cases an increase would be effected. Such a prospect the ordinary traveller to town cannot endure, and it is certainly hard that, at this distance from the War, increased fares should add to his troubled lot.

But it is by no means certain that the proposed alterations will be put into effect, because local elasticity is always allowed by the companies, and, moreover, the rates which they put into their schedule are maximum rates. It seems strange that there has never been in this country anything like a standard in charges for season tickets, and some such proposal as is now being mooted must one day befall us—so inevitable is the progress of uniformity—but not yet: we have suffered too much in too short a time!

The Decay of Civilisation.

There was a time when the Fabian Society had significance in the structure of modern thought, but before the War it had become démodé, and now it is hopelessly passé. Not for its own sake, therefore, but for the sake of its subject, is its proposal to debate, in October and November, the question "Is Civilisation Decaying?" attracting a certain amount of attention. Of course the question has been topical for some time. Those intellectuals not sociologically minded have for some time been inclined to answer with a puzzled "Yes" to the question; and even poets, who used to say that the victory of the Allies in the War saved civilisation, are not now so sure. European civilisation was certainly saved, but there is a disposition abroad now, to question, not indeed whether the glory of that salvation was worth it, but whether the civilisation that has once more fastened round the life of Europe (and of America) is worth preserving. The desire to return to simpler, more leisurely ways of living is now very deep, though whether such a return might be made to coincide with a mere decay of the present civilisation is doubtful. Certainly the Fabians, whatever they may say about our civilisation, will be wide of the mark, for the only result of their practices is to make life more complex.

The Roads of England.

It is comforting to know that, in spite of the huge increase in the number of motor-cars on the roads, there are still people who prefer to travel England on foot. The motorist is often a very pleasant fellow, but seldom a very wise or discerning one, and this because most things and people in life come alike to him. But the walker has time to notice the differences in places and in folk, and does not, consequently, cease to wonder at the infinite variety of England. A certain Mr. Cummings has just travelled across England on foot, quite in the old style, for a wager, and the event caused more genuine interest than many a motor-car race.

This revival of walking is, of course, being seized upon by the boot manufacturers, who are said recently to have begun to despair of Englishmen ever extensively using their feet again. But now we are hearing such slogans as "Walk well and keep well," and similar advice, which redounds to the benefit of the manufacturer.

The Creation of Rubbish.

Nothing is more offensive to the ordered eye than the presence in beautiful places of litter or rubbish, but few things are more difficult than to make the man in the street realise how offensive he is when he distributes paper, or orange peel, or sardine tins broadcast. Tidiness in the London parks, for instance, is preserved at the cost of thousands of pounds a year, and recently we have had cases of the fining of people for making a litter. It seems a little thing, the tearing up and throwing away of a letter or the dropping of peanut shells, but it has been sufficient to secure a conviction in the police courts. This is not tyrannical legislation; it is completely justified by the plea of public dignity.

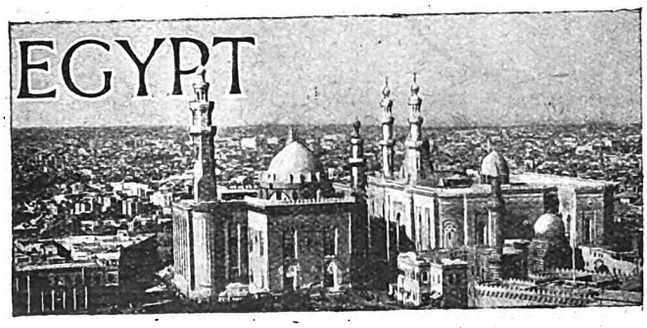
From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, August 23.

The Moheb Affair.

Political sensations serve their turn and are forgotten. The affaire Moheb has been no exception to the rule. A week ago the newspapers devoted half their space to the doings and sayings of the ex-Minister of Finance. To-day he is almost unremembered. There are merely a few final splutterings, like the fitful flashes and dying rumblings of a thunderstorm that has passed. The controversy has had one definite result. It has enabled the Prime Minister to consolidate his position, which has latterly been subjected to attacks from various quarters. Yehia Pasha's remonstrance to the Residency regarding its interference in the affairs of the Cabinet has been welcomed by the whole Press, which sees therein a new proof of Egypt's independence, and an indication of the Prime Minister's will and courage to "keep his end up" vis-à-vis the British representative in this country. The present Government appears, therefore, to be more firmly in the saddle than ever before. It is receiving the support of several newspapers which have until lately been the upholders of the Wafd, whose funds are said to have run low. The Zaghloulist Party is now supported only by a few of the less important sheets, while the leading newspapers, such as Ahram, Mokattam, Siassa, and Akhbar, are, as in the case of the two first-named, and the last, independent, while the third is the organ of the Constitutional Liberal Party. None of the papers indicated ever supported the Wafd very wholeheartedly, but two years ago it was possible for the Zaghloulists so heavily to subsidise their own organs that they could compete with the journals named. That is no longer the case. Even the Wafd's French organ, La Liberté, seems now to have deserted the party whose principles it has hitherto defended, and to have gone over to the Government's side.

Rushdy Pasha's "Plot."

Hussein Rushdy Pasha, of whom little has been heard of late, has suddenly emerged into the open with a letter to the Press which, in less eventful times, would have attracted more attention than has been given it. Atef Bey Barakat, of the Wafd executive, recently publicly accused Rushdy Pasha of being a liar, a traitor to his country, of having cheated the ex-Khedive out of part of his property, and, worst crime of all, of having remarked, when Zaghloul Pasha was exiled to the Seychelles, "This is a glorious day for Egypt." Rushdy Pasha was not slow in returning a Roland for an Oliver, and, in the course of his reply, wrote, "Let Atef Bey know, if he does not know it, that I should have been hanged long ago, if the British had been able to discover everything that I was doing in the political world, for my acts constituted a veritable plot against the Martial Law which I was officially charged to administer."

It is hard to believe that Rushdy Pasha wishes to be taken seriously.

The Elections.

The postponement of the elections, to which I alluded a fortnight ago, is the chief subject of political discussion at the moment. The reason for the delay is, as I pointed out, that the electoral rolls have been very badly drawn up. They are so full of inaccuracies and omissions that in most cases they have had to be compiled again, from the beginning. Electoral committees have been established in each district, but it seems that the members of the committees have left practically the whole of the work to the Sheiyoukh el harat (the sheikhs in charge of districts), part of whose duties it is to know every householder in the areas of which they are in charge. It appears that these sheikhs have made a terrible mess of their work, including in the lists names of persons who have been dead for years, others who have never had any existence, and making such numerous spelling mistakes that it is impossible to identify names on the lists with those of actual residents. An example of the chaos is furnished by the Karmouz district of Alexandria, where of 19,000 names on the rolls 12,500 cannot be traced. The Prime Minister has addressed a very strong circular letter to Governors and Mudirs, pointing out the shortcomings of the officials entrusted with the work, and insisting that those guilty of negligence shall be punished. At the same time orders have been given that new rolls are to be submitted within a fortnight.

Yehia Pasha, in an interview the other day, said that he hoped it would be possible to complete the first stage of the elections by the middle of September. The elections proper would then take place, for deputies in November and for Senators in December, Parliament assembling early in January. It is generally thought that this estimate is somewhat optimistic, the chaos which has arisen over the electoral rolls holding out little promise of subsequent stages of the elections proceeding very smoothly. Incidentally, the Prime Minister denied a report, which apparently originated in a letter to The Times, signed by "Egyptophile," that has been cabled out to one of the Arabic newspapers, that reactionary influences are at work to postpone indefinitely the assembling of Parliament.

Assistance for Cotton Growers.

The Government is contemplating further steps to assist the cotton industry. It has already initiated a scheme by which growers are able to obtain advances up to 50 per cent. of the market value of their cotton, thus enabling them to hold the crop in the hope of better price levels. Its recent entry into the market as a buyer on a large scale is also an attempt in the same direction. It is reported that the small growers in the provinces are not taking advantage of the opportunity to raise money on their cotton, preferring to sell outright for the full value rather than obtain temporary assistance to the extent of only 50 per cent. of the market price. A demand is being made that the amount advanced should be increased from 50 per cent. to 75 per cent. of the value, and the Government is now considering this proposition; but it is difficult to believe that it will be adopted. Other suggested measures are Government control of the Bourse, control of dealing in "futures," the creation of a data-collecting bureau, etc. As may be imagined, the commercial community in Alexandria views with some apprehension the reported intention of the Government to interfere in the normal business of the city.

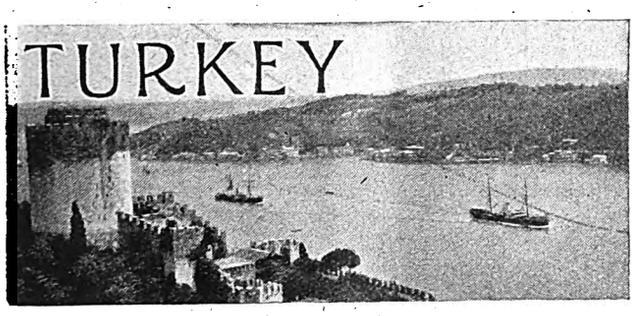
The London Legation.

Aziz Pasha Ezzet, who had been selected for appointment as first Egyptian Ambassador in London, has been requested by the Government to return from Europe, where he was spending the summer, to Egypt, and is now on his way. He is not in the best of health, and is reported to have written to the King, requesting to be allowed to decline the appointment, on account of his ill-health. Meanwhile, Ahmed Bey Hassanein, the well-known explorer, who recently returned from a journey across the Libyan Desert, from north to south, is stated to be a likely candidate for the position of First Secretary at the London Legation.



Constantinople, August 28.

Ratification and Evacuation.

The Treaty has been ratified by the National Assembly; the evacuation is in full swing. Last Thursday evening the Allied High Commissioners received through Adnan Bey from Ismet Pasha an official letter announcing the fact of the ratification, and on Friday three transports full of British troops had already left. During the week-end the pre-arranged plans of evacuation have been carried into execution, and at the moment of writing the British garrison has been practically reduced to the Guards Brigade and the Duke of Wellington's Regiment, which are remaining on until a late period in the agreed six weeks in order to give the Turkish authorities time to take over the control of the city and of the surrounding area. The Asiatic side has been virtually evacuated, and the British garrisons replaced by Turkish. Side by side with the evacuation of the Constantinople area, the movement of British troops from the Straits zone is also proceeding.

The attitude of the indigenous elements to the course of events varies with their racial feelings. The non-Moslem races have always been curiously incredulous on the subject of the possibility of evacuation. The wish to retain the protection of the Allied forces has been father to the thought; and now that they see their protectors relentlessly leaving the country for good and all, they are suffering from a mixture of panic and fatalism which is almost incomprehensible to the more energetic people from the North, who are apt to lose patience with their moans and wails and to reproach them for not taking definite steps to put themselves out of the reach of the Turks while they yet had the chance.

Turks and the Evacuation.

The elation of the Turks at the departure of the foreign troops is very comprehensible, but to those of us who remember how during the past five years the vast majority of Turks in Constantinople have in their heart of hearts approved of the well-meant measures for the improvement of public health, public order, and civil organisation, which have been carried into effect tant bien que mal by the Allied authorities, the vulgar abuse which the majority of the Turkish journalistic writers consider it their duty to employ in their effusions on the subject of the evacuation strikes us as peculiarly nasty lip-service to the potentates at Angora. An honourable exception to this offensive gutter-press tone is provided by the Vatan, which goes out of its way to speak in calm, gentlemanly tones concerning the dignified and friendly attitude of General Harington in the execution of his delicate duties, and it is for us to recognise the valuable broad-mindedness of Ahmed Emin Bey and his comprehension of a sense of duty which transgresses the narrow limits of post-War chauvinism and bitterness.

Ismet Pasha's Speech.

The next event of first-class importance during the week has been the speech of Ismet Pasha in the Assembly. It is no exaggeration to say that in content and tone this speech excels any other pronouncement of any Turkish statement since the War. Primarily designed as a dialectical defence of the Treaty against violent criticism on the part of a few members of the Assembly, it contains a reasoned exposé of the difficulties encountered by the Turkish delegation in their struggle against the serried forces of Europe, and a tacit recognition of the relative weakness of Turkey. You will search it in vain, however, for signs of the impotent wails of the weakling's rage, and it betrays a sound comprehension of the realities of Turkey's international situation. It provides an effective counterpoise to the somewhat bellicose tone of Mustapha Kemal's inaugural speech, to which reference was made last week. in that Ismet Pasha lays stress upon the fact that the new international situation of Turkey provides her with unrivalled opportunities for prudent peaceful development.

Internal Differences.

The overwhelming majority by which the Treaty was ratified emphasises the excellence of the party discipline, but, however great may be the unanimity on this cardinal point in foreign affairs, the course of internal affairs gives every one much food for thought. The divergence of views between the out-and-out Kemalists, the adherents of the C.U.P., and the old Conservatives on such questions as the separation of the Sultanate from the Khalifate, the situation of the capital, the policy to be pursued towards Russia, and the settlement of the financial situation of the ex-officials and reserve officers, shows no signs of being healed—au contraire. The almost open defection of Raouf Bey is regarded as extremely significant, the growing uneasiness of enlightened Turkish opinion in Constantinople as to the economic fate of the city, the disaffection of the demobilised officers' associations who are actively preaching opposition to Mustapha Kemal at numerous important centres in Anatolia, such as Smyrna, Konia, and Cæsarea, and the growing conviction, which is finding its way into print, that the real touchstone of the settlement of Turkey's future and the future of the present leaders is the debt settlement; all these questions of major importance are now being discussed by cooler heads in relation to their bearing on the prospects of the present Government and leaders.

The Economic Prospect.

The catastrophic economic situation and the progressive depreciation of Turkish money on the foreign exchange market are the object of discussions by a commission appointed by the Minister of Finance. The old parrot-cry of speculation on the Constantinople bourse has been bandied about in the Press like the bekdji's call of "fire," but the commission, to judge from inspired reports, has realised the deeper causes, although it has been unable to suggest any practical remedies which do not either bring in their train equally serious evils or involve the economic, and hence political, dependence of the country upon the foreigner, "which is absurd," as Euclid used to say. It was recognised that the sole means of putting the financial situation right is the development of exportation, which is going to be a long and tedious business.

Harvest reports from Anatolia are not wholly unfavourable, but they do not give any precise figures of the area under cultivation compared with that of pre-War years, and that is the important point. The cereal crops in the Konia, Afiun, and Angora districts are good, but in the region of Biledjik and Eskishehir they have seriously suffered from drought and the depredations of wild boars. The Konia region is expected to have 300 trucks available for Constantinople, whereas its pre-War export amounted on the average to twice as much. The tobacco crop in the Adebazar and Sabandja areas is reported to be excellent as regards quality and yield. The possibility of any cereal crop this year is said to be due to the prevision of the Government, which distributed generous quantities of seed grain accumulated in army depots at Konia and South-West Anatolia from last year's abundant crop, that could not be exported on account of the state of war. It is satisfactory to know that during the past ten months considerable progress has been made in the work of reconstructing and rendering habitable the devastated regions.

IRAK.

Baghdad, August 22.

The Affair at Mosul.

Mosul was the scene of an incident of minor importance a few days ago, which was allowed to assume greater proportions than it deserved. A trivial dispute occurred in the bazaar between a Mohammedan private of the Irak Army and a private of the Assyrian levies, which ended in their coming to blows. Some of the onlookers joined in, and a regular rough-and-tumble fight with fists took place, and had no notice been taken of it there is ground for supposing that with the separation of the two sides the incident would have been closed. The Government, however, appears to have panicked; wild telegrams were sent to Baghdad, Indian troops and armoured cars were brought into the town, and there was every indication that the Government regarded the situation as serious. This gave the politicians of Mosul an opportunity which they have been waiting for for some time. They made it a political matter, and tried to organise the preparation of petitions for the removal of the Assyrian levies; though what would take their place on frontier defence it is not easy to see. There is not the slightest probability that the people of Mosul would enlist in the Irak Army so as to defend their frontier; they, and indeed all the Arabs, have hitherto shown a conspicuous unwillingness to enlist in their national army, and there is no reason to suppose that they would do so with any greater alacrity if there were no levies in the town.

New Legislation.

In spite of the nearness of the elections to the National Assembly, the Council of Ministers has been busy of late with new legislation, the most important of which are the Irak Passport Law and the Shara Courts Law. The Passport Law lays it down that any person desiring to leave Irak, whether by land or by sea, must be in possession of a permit to travel or a passport visé or endorsed by the Government of Irak. Pending the enactment of a law of nationality for the inhabitants of Irak an inhabitant of Irak who is not a foreign subject may obtain a permit to travel in lieu of a passport. Mohammedan pilgrims travelling in organised parties do not require permits to travel or passports, but the leader of the party should possess a pilgrim pass, in which the names of the persons for whom he is responsible are shown. Tribesmen in their customary areas or vocations entering or leaving Irak by land do not require permits to travel.

The Shara Courts Law is intended to regularise the procedure of the religious courts and at the same time to effect economies by avoiding duplication of staff. The law abolishes the post of Naib Jefariyah or judge of the Shiah Court, which hitherto has in many districts existed side by side with the regular Sunni Shara Courts. Instead, it is now laid down that a kadi may be either Sunni or Shiah, though in Basrah and Baghdad and such other bigger places which may be notified by royal iradahs, there may be both a Sunni and a Shiah kadi. Arrangements have been made, however, for safeguarding the rights of the two sects in cases where Sunni and Shiah religious law differ from one another. In suits which must be decided according to the Shiah rules, it is laid down that they shall, if brought before a Sunni kadi, be referred by him to a Shiah divine, who shall issue a fetva on the case, and the kadi must give his judgment according to the ruling of the fetva. The same procedure applies, mutatis mutandis, where cases which must be decided in the light of Sunni law are brought before a Shiah kadi. The law makes provision for a sufficient number of both Sunnis and Shiahs in the Court of Appeal. It would appear that the provisions of the law are unobjectionable and provide adequate safeguards for both Sunnis and Shiahs, but it is viewed with great suspicion by the Shiahs, who persist in regarding the Government as a Sunni institution, intent on opposing in any way it can the interests of the Shiahs.

Public Executions.

Less objectionable, however, from every point of view, is the order which lays down that henceforward executions shall take place in public. The order states that hanging a man inside the jail is not a sufficiently strong deterrent to crime, and it has, therefore, been decided that henceforward all persons condemned to death and whose sentences are confirmed by the King, will be hanged in public, and the bodies left exposed to public view for some time. This order is to be regretted, not merely as an act of wanton barbarity, but as being likely to render increasingly difficult the administration of justice. Hitherto, it has not been easy to get trustworthy evidence in murder cases, and if this decision is carried into effect it is likely to be almost impossible to obtain evidence in future. Indications are not wanting, however, that there is little intention of putting the order into force, as no sooner was it published than an Irak Government Gazette was published which contained royal iradahs commuting the death sentence passed on twelve persons convicted of various murders into penal servitude for life.

Cholera.

A serious outbreak of cholera of apparently a very virulent type has broken out at Abadan, and has extended to Basrah. At Abadan there have been over 650 deaths, and over 90 per cent. of the cases have proved fatal. In Basrah it has been less serious, deaths averaging 20 a day for the past week, but in Baghdad only three cases have come to light to date. All possible measures have been taken to prevent its spread, and the regulations governing travel from Basrah to Baghdad are very stringent, no third-class passengers being allowed to travel either by rail or by river. As a result the fast train service between Basrah and Baghdad has been suspended except the train on Fridays which connects with the mail steamer. During the last two days the number of cases has shown a welcome decrease, and it is hoped that the epidemic is now under control.

An aeroplane carrying Flying Officer Whitmore and Aircraftsman Taylor crashed at Peshawur on August 21. Both occupants were killed.

Their Highnesses the Maharaja and Maharanee Gaekwar of Baroda arrived in Paris on August 30 from St. Moritz, to attend the cremation of their son, Prince Jaisingh Rao, who died whilst travelling from Berlin to Flushing. The ceremony which took place in Paris on September 1 at Pére la Chaise was of the simplest character, and included certain Hindu rites, comprising recitations from the Hindu sacred book, the Bhagad Gita.

A Reformed Calendar.

In a letter to The Times of August 27 a correspondent included the resolution in relation to the reform of the calendar which is soon to be considered by a Committee of the League of Nations, adopted by the Pan-Orthodox Council held last May in Constantinople. The document runs as follows:—

> Œcumenical Patriarchate, Office of the Pan-Orthodox Synod. Resolution adopted: His Holiness proposes the following resolution for the vote of the Synod:—
> (1) The removal of the difference between the ecclesiastical and civil calendar throughout the Churches of the Orthodox Powers is recognised as an inevitable necessity in view of prevailing custom.
> (2) It is confidently affirmed that from the point of view of canonical ordinances there is no obstacle to the rectification of the ecclesiastical calendar in use in accordance with the data of astronomical science.
> (3) The Julian calendar is rectified by the removal from it of thirteen days, which make up the error in calculation as to the scientific solar year from the time of the first Œcumenical Synod to the present day.
> (4) On account of the removal of the thirteen days it is determined that October 1, 1923, be counted as October 14, and that we keep the feasts of the omitted days all at once on October 14 and thereafter as the chief authority of the province may determine.
>
> (5) The ordinances of the sacred canons relating to the feast of Easter are observed without change, but the determining of the feast is hereafter to be on the basis of the data of astronomical science.
> (6) The fundamental principles of the canonical ordinances which are to be observed without breach are these:—(a) We keep the feast on the Lord's Day; (b) after the spring equinox; (c) after the first full moon. All these fundamental principles are reckoned according to the time of the Holy City, Jerusalem, and for greater accuracy according to the time of the meridian which passes through the Church of the Crucifixion on Golgotha.
> (7) It is referred to the observatories of the Orthodox Powers of Greece, Serbia, Roumania, and Russia that on the basis of the canonical data stated above they shall prepare a table of

(8) The present readjustment of the Julian calendar and of the ordinary Paschal system is not opposed to the design for the preparation of a universal calendar, which shall be more perfect, practically and scientifically. On the contrary, it is in the hope of discovering general agreement for a calendar more perfect both than the Gregorian and the Julian that it describes the present readjustment as opportune.

Italy and Greece.

The reception by the British Press of the news of the Italo-Greek dispute is varied, though most journals, while admitting the extreme provocation under which Italy is smarting, reproach Signor Mussolini for his swift measures. The Daily News, for example, asks for proof of official Greek complicity in the murders, and says :—

> To most people it will seem incredible that Athens would commit so monstrous a folly as to lend itself to a murderous attack on the members of an international commission. But, in any case, there should be no talk of war among serious statesmen; and Signor Mussolini's headlong and headstrong action is a deplorable misuse of his powers and responsibilities. After all, both Italy and Greece have signed the Covenant of the League of Nations; this manifestly is just the kind of ominous crisis which ought to be considered by the League with deliberate detachment and impartiality.

The Morning Post, on the other hand, while sympathising profoundly with the Italian people, suggests that the crime was committed by lawless bands, and that the Italian impulse should, therefore, be controlled by cool judgment. Its sympathy with Italy is so strong and unqualified that it has no doubt of the eventual outcome of the affair.

The Times warns Signor Mussolini that he is playing with fire: but thinks the problem may be solved either by the Conference of Ambassadors or by the League of Nations.

The Manchester Guardian thinks that nothing can avert a catastrophe unless the Governments and the Press of Europe keep a cool head. Italy, it affirms, is acting under the influence of a passion which destroys all sense of perspective, and she must, therefore, be made to realise that her case will be fairly treated by the League of Nations.

The Daily Telegraph states that the Powers must concentrate first of all on the prevention of war between Italy and Greece and its spreading to other Balkan States. The matter must be thrashed out by the League of Nations, and in the meantime no dramatic moves should take place. On the whole, it is hopeful of a solution—

> The worst thing that could happen would be that Greece should be encouraged from any quarter to hold out in stiff opposition to further concessions. She is in no position to fight. . . . Her true policy lies not in imploring the League of Nations to help her to resist Italy but in seeking, through the League, from Italy the most favourable terms. On the broader questions raised by the events of the last week it will be generally agreed that the position is very disconcerting for those who had hoped that international action of the thunderbolt kind was a thing of the past. Yet after all they had none too good warrant for confidence in view of the general course of European politics during the present year . . . . The saving fact of the present situation is that Signor Mussolini loses no opportunity to reiterate his declaration that what has taken place is not an act of war, and that Corfu is being occupied merely as a guarantee or pledge—to borrow a phrase from the Ruhr—that Greece shall make the full reparation required. In less dangerous circumstances, as we have said, such a phrase might be subjected to destructive criticism; in the present it is a saving formula, because it gives welcome assurance that Italy herself has no intention of enlarging the boundaries of this dangerous episode and risking the outbreak of another Balkan conflagration. We repeat that the consideration which should be supreme above everything else is the prevention of open war.

FOOTBALL IN BULGARIA.

Our Sofia Correspondent writes :—

It is really remarkable how Bulgarians have taken to football. Before the War there were few football clubs in Bulgaria, and very little interest was taken in the game. To-day it is on the fair way of becoming a national pastime, and most towns and villages have their teams. The season is from April to September, and at present there is keen competition as to who will head the Sofia League.

But more interesting than this is the international character which the game is taking. This summer Roumanian and Czecho-Slovak teams have visited Sofia and played several matches against the leading clubs. There was little to choose between the Roumanian and Bulgarian teams, but the "Rousse," of Prague, were slightly stronger than the majority of the Sofia teams. The best match seen this year was that between "Rousse" and "Levsky," one of the strongest Bulgarian clubs. Some really good football was played in a game which was eventually won by "Levsky" by 2 goals to 1. The keenness shown for football is one of the encouraging signs about post-War Bulgaria.

Field-Marshal Lord Grenfell, formerly Governor of Malta, will lay the foundation-stone of the Maltese pavilion at Wembley on September 8, the anniversary of the Turkish defeat in Malta in 1565 (the Maltese national festival).

The Princess, who was married to the late King Constantine's brother in 1920, was accorded all the rights and privileges of a Greek princess. At the expressed wish of the late Princess, her funeral will take place in America. Her sister, Mrs. Green, arrived in London from the United States on September 1, with Mr. and Miss Green.

THE CURSE OF THE BALKANS.

By the bombardment and occupation of Corfu Italy has put herself entirely in the wrong in her quarrel with Greece, for in none of the precedents that she has quoted can justification be found for the unseemly haste with which she acted, without ensuring the safety of the civilian population of the town. The terms of her ultimatum showed a lack of the sense of proportion and were, therefore, not worthy of a first-class Power. Europe is not where it was in 1914, when Austria-Hungary, with the deliberate intention of provoking a war, could send a similar ultimatum to Serbia. The world has moved a long way since then, although the fact would seem to have been lost upon the Italian Government. The crime for which Greece has to be held responsible is admittedly as black as the Italians paint it, and on this point the whole civilised world agrees with them, but their method of calling for redress was not that of a people who claim to take a leading part in Europe. Firmness is not synonymous with bullying, and loses rather than gains from an exhibition of irresponsible excitability. The bombardment of the undefended town of Corfu, it is charitable to suppose, can hardly have been in the mind of the Italian Government when it proposed the landing of a contingent of troops as a temporary measure to show Italy's intention to enforce the reparations due to her; but absence of self-control in Rome reacts on the Italian Navy, and the guns go off at Corfu for no reason, presumably, other than panic on board or a desire for "frightfulness." An act that might be expected from a Central American State is hard to exonerate when it is committed by a so-called Great Power, and it will generally be conceded that Italian prestige, which had been largely re-established by Signor Mussolini's Government, has suffered a more serious blow than would be entailed by defeat on the field of battle.

There were the strongest possible reasons why the Italian Government should proceed with dignity and deliberation to exact redress for the murder of the Military Mission engaged in the delimitation of the Græco-Albanian frontier, apart from the fact that her overwhelming strength as compared with that of Greece left no occasion for haste. The murder was committed well within Greek territory; but conditions in the Balkan frontier districts are such that there must always be an element of doubt as to the nationality of any band until conclusive evidence is forthcoming. Although relations between the Albanians and Italians have improved of late, it could not be regarded as altogether out of the question that certain Albanian outlaws should wish to pay off old scores against Italy. On the other hand there is plenty of bad blood between Greeks and Italians, and for this reason alone it would have been expected that the Italian Government would act circumspectly in affixing responsibility for the murder. As things are, it has exposed itself to the charge of being as lacking in a sense of responsibility as the murderers of General Tellini, with the result that, even if the Greek nationality of the assassins is accepted, the feeling will remain that Italy has been concerned merely to settle her old account with Greece rather than, in virtue of her position as a first-class Power, to use the opportunity for remedying an intolerable state of affairs in Europe, of which the murder of her mission was the result.

No blunders on Italy's part, however, can diminish the gravity of the crime for which Greece has to bear the responsibility. The Greeks have tolerated a system common to all the Balkan States, and in this respect may not be sinners above their neighbours. Lawlessness on the frontiers has always been connived at, even where it has not been actually encouraged as a factor in national propaganda. Among States of approximately equal military strength Komitaji bands serve their purpose, and it is only when they belong to a country much weaker than its neighbours that their activities are apt to become an embarrassment, as Bulgaria has found to her cost. In Epirus the Greek bands would be regarded as patriots, and if they had confined their attention entirely to Albanians, Europe would probably have continued to turn a blind eye towards them. It so happens, however, that they have murdered an Italian General and four other Italians, and not only Greece, it is to be hoped, but also every other Balkan State (for there are Komitajis on nearly every frontier) will now realise that it does not pay to tolerate a system entirely at variance with civilised government. Italy, unfortunately, has shown such a poor appreciation of her responsibilities as a Great Power in that she has tried to treat the outrage as a matter concerning only Greece and herself. It concerns Europe as a whole, however, very much, and, apart from the personal redress due to Italy, the supreme authority in Europe, now the League of Nations, ought to seize the opportunity of dealing once for all with the Komitaji curse in the Balkans. The Italian Government, it will be noticed, was more anxious to pile spectacular humiliation upon Greece than to use the tragedy for the betterment of the backward Balkan States. The League of Nations can step in where Italy has failed it, and if it saves Greece from Italian fury, the price of its services ought to be the complete elimination of all Komitajis in Greece. When the Greek bands have disappeared it will be possible to take up the question with the Yugoslav, Bulgarian and Albanian Governments. In Macedonia the existence of bands is largely due to political injustice, and if the Græco-Italian conflict has brought home to the League the constant danger that these bands are to the peace of Europe it may appreciate for the first time the necessity of settling the Macedonian question instead of allowing it to simmer, with occasional eruptions which sooner or later may embroil a much wider area.

IRAK AND NEJD.

[On September 1 H.M. Stationery Office published Sir Percy Cox's Report on Irak Administration, covering the period October, 1920, to March, 1922. Not the least interesting part of the Report is that dealing with Irak's foreign relations, and we reproduce here Sir Percy's account of Irak's relations with Nejd.—Ed.]

NAJD.*

Extension of Ibn Sa'ud's Authority.

The predominant facts in the politics of Arabia during the past 18 months have been the capture of Hail by Ibn Sa'ud and his subsequent efforts to push his tribal influence in the northern part of the peninsula up to the borders of 'Iraq and the necessity thereby involved of a definite delimitation of frontiers both in the case of the 'Iraq and also in that of Kuwait.

Troubles between Ibn Sa'ud and Kuwait.

As regards Kuwait, a treaty concluded between Ibn Sa'ud and His Majesty's Government in December, 1915, and ratified in the following July, contained the following clauses :—

1. His Majesty's Government do acknowledge and admit that Najd, Al Hasa, Qatif and Jubail and their dependencies and territories, which will be discussed and determined hereafter, are the countries of Ibn Sa'ud.
2. Ibn Sa'ud undertakes to refrain from aggression on or interference with the territories of Kuwait, Bahrain, etc., and the limits of their territories shall be afterwards determined.

The delimitation of boundaries was thus expressly left in abeyance, but in the Anglo-Turkish Convention of 1913 the area under the direct control of the Shaikh of Kuwait had been defined on the map by a red circle with a radius of some 70 miles from Kuwait on all sides, while a farther area, from Umm Qasr to Al Ratk, thence down the Batin to Hafar and eastward to the Persian Gulf which it reached at Jabal Manifah, some 200 miles south of Kuwait, was recognised as being within his sphere of influence.

In 1919 the respective claims of the Shaikh of Kuwait and Ibn Sa'ud over this outer zone gave rise to a dispute which resulted, in September, in an unsuccessful attack on Jahrah, a village which lies about 30 miles west of Kuwait, on the part of the Akhwan leader, Faisal al Duwish. I met Ibn Sa'ud at Ojair at the end of September, on my way to Basrah, and resumed the cordial relations which I have ever enjoyed with him, but a suggested conference at Kuwait did not materialise. At the end of December Ibn Duwish raided a section of the Shammar camped in the desert borders of the 'Iraq, in retaliation for the undoubtedly provocative attitude of which they had been guilty. Some of the Dhafir, a tribe subject to the 'Iraq administration, were camped with the Shammar and shared in their losses, while during January not only the Dhafir but also the Samawah confederation of the Huchaim suffered from Akhwan raids.

Early in February, 1920, Ibn Sa'ud sent his relative, 'Abdullah ibn Thunaiyan, on deputation to Baghdad. He was accompanied by a native of Mosul, Dr. 'Abdullah, who had been for some years a resident at Riyadh. Ibn Thunaiyan stayed in Baghdad till May, while Dr. 'Abdullah returned to Riyadh in the following November. Both were helpful in dealing with current questions with Najd. As regards the dispute touching the boundary of Kuwait, the Shaikh of Muhammerah, as a friend of both parties, arranged that his son, together with Shaikh Salim's nephew, Ahmad al Jabir, should visit Ibn Sa'ud at his capital with a view to adjusting differences. On February 27th, while the party were at Riyadh, the death of Shaikh Salim removed the chief obstacle to agreement. When Shaikh Ahmad returned to Kuwait on March 24th he was nominated by the notables of the town successor to Shaikh Salim, since when, although the final settlement of the Kuwait frontier has not yet been effected, no further hostilities have occurred.

Subjugation of Jabal Shammar.

For the next eight months Ibn Sa'ud was occupied in pursuing his long-cherished ambition to subdue Hail and the Shammar of Ibn Rashid. By April he had defeated 'Abdullah ibn Mit'ab, the ruling Amir of Jabal Shammar, in a series of engagements, and had begun the blockade of Hail. The immediate results in the 'Iraq of this campaign were twofold. It produced a state of continuous lawlessness on the southern frontiers; the Dhafir and some of the local tribes, profiting by the general unrest, engaged in raids and forays, sometimes on the Akhwan, sometimes on each other, on the tribes of Kuwait, while the Akhwan retaliated on their side. Secondly, it started a migration to the 'Iraq of Shammar tribes fleeing from the forces of Ibn Sa'ud. They passed up through the 'Amarat 'Anizah, the tribesmen of Fahad Beg ibn Hadhdhal, and a portion of them crossed the Euphrates at Ramadi into the Jazirah, after paying kodah, a tax on domestic animals, to the 'Iraq administration. The rest remained in the pasturages of the 'Amarat.

The Refugee Shammar.

Fahad Beg had obtained an assurance from Ibn Sa'ud that he and tribes camping with him should be immune from attack on the part of the Akhwan, but the fact that the Shammar of Najd, whom Ibn Sa'ud regarded as rebellious subjects, had taken refuge with the 'Anizah, was naturally galling to the Imam, and in the end of April he wrote a sharp letter to Ibn Hadhdhal, reminding him of the ties of kinship—Ibn Sa'ud is himself of 'Anizah descent—claiming authority over all 'Anizah, and, while recognising their close relations with his friend the British Government in 'Iraq, declaring that he would not agree to their being ruled by any Arab except himself. At the same time he wrote to inform me that an assembly of the leading men of Najd had invited him to assume the title of Sultan, which he had accordingly done, and asked for recognition by His Majesty's Government. This was officially accorded to him on August 22.

Ibn Sa'ud's letter crossed one from myself acquainting him with the fact that His Majesty's Government were disposed to admit and support the candidature of the Amir Faisal to the throne of 'Iraq. Ibn Sa'ud had recently given another proof of his loyal friendship with the British Government by persuading his subjects, at the risk of grave dissatisfaction on their part, to refrain for the third year from performing the pilgrimage so as to avoid possible friction with the Hijaz, and his reply to my letter, far from intimating opposition to the presence of the Amir Faisal in the 'Iraq, breathed his willingness to accept the decision of His Majesty's Government, coupled with the prayer that his own interests might be equally respected. The Amir Faisal, while on his way up the Gulf, had himself written to Ibn Sa'ud, and he received from him a reply couched in amicable terms.

The refugee Shammar were, however, a difficult problem, and, as Fahad Beg rightly pointed out, their presence among his own tribe was likely to prove a danger to the latter. The Shammar used the asylum thus afforded them as a safe vantage ground from which to raid the Akhwan, and it was clear that the 'Anizah might well be involved in the counter-raids of the Akhwan. All Shammar were accordingly ordered to cross the Euphrates into the Hillah Division, where their movements could more easily be controlled.

Fall of Hail.

Meantime the Amir 'Abdullah ibn Rashid had made submission to Ibn Sa'ud, but his cousin, Muhammad ibn Tallal, held out in Hail, and sent messages to me begging me to intervene between himself and Ibn Sa'ud. The latter, however, refused all offers of mediation, and early in November the prolonged struggle terminated in the submission of Hail to the Sultan of Najd. The victor exhibited a clemency as generous as it was statesmanlike. He took immediate steps to relieve the population of the town, which had been reduced to great straits during the siege, and appointed Ibrahim al Subhan, the head of a house which had served as Wazirs of the Al Rashid and was closely related to them by marriage, as Governor of Hail, placing a small garrison of his own followers in the citadel. He and his son contracted matrimonial alliances with the Rashid and Subhan, and the Rashid family were removed to Riyadh, where they were treated with all honour.

Correspondence between the 'Iraq and Najd.

I instructed the Political Agent at Kuwait to convey my congratulations to the Sultan, together with my appreciation of his conduct, and at the same time I pressed upon him the importance of an early meeting between himself and King Faisal, under my auspices, to establish a clear understanding as to the frontiers of the two Arab States and the treatment of tribal affairs. Ibn Sa'ud replied with the suggestion that a preliminary agreement on the principles of the proposed treaty was desirable, before the actual meeting of himself and King Faisal took place. To this, in accord with His Majesty, I agreed, but in intimating concurrence it seemed necessary, in view of the extravagant claims which Ibn Sa'ud was known to be contemplating, to lay down the prima facie basis on which, in my opinion, negotiations should be conducted, namely, that the tribes of Muntafiq, 'Anizah, and Dhafir must be accepted as appertaining to the 'Iraq, and that the line of the frontier would be determined in accordance with predominant and prescriptive rights to watering-places.

As regards the 'Anizah, the attitude of the 'Amarat, under Fahad Beg ibn Hadhdhal, is one of unqualified determination to remain, as 'Iraq tribesmen, under the direct protection of the British Government. On the Syrian side of the desert it would appear that the Ruwallah section of the 'Anizah are prepared to accept Ibn Sa'ud's suzerainty.

Akhwan Propaganda and Attack.

There had been for some time past friction between the 'Iraq Government and the Shaikh of the Dhafir, Humud ibn Suwait. Owing to his failure to control his tribe from raiding, his subsidy had been intermitted, while there was a large claim against him on the part of a group of Mosul merchants who had been robbed by his tribesmen in the previous spring. It was unfortunate at this juncture that King Faisal sanctioned in January the appointment of Yusuf Beg al Sa'dun as head of a Camel Corps which was intended to guard the southern frontiers of 'Iraq. Between Yusuf Beg and Ibn Suwait there was long-standing enmity, and the latter was likely to regard the appointment of his rival to control the southern marches as a direct blow aimed at himself. He did, in fact, repair at once to Riyadh, and though I requested Ibn Sa'ud not to receive him, on the ground that he was in trouble with the 'Iraq administration, my letter did not reach Riyadh until after his visit. He returned with presents from the Sultan of Najd, and was accompanied by an Akhwan representative, Ibn Ma'ammar, despatched for the purpose of collecting tribute from the Dhafir as well as from 'Iraq shepherds pasturing their flocks in the desert.

Meantime, the arrival of a large body of Akhwan at Hafar early in February had alarmed the 'Iraq tribes, who withdrew to the neighbourhood of the railway, fearing reprisals for raids on the Akhwan, for which the Dhafir had been responsible during the winter. A few days later a section of the refugee Shammar, who were on their way to make submission to Ibn Sa'ud, were attacked near Shabikah, south of Najaf, by a Shammar Shaikh who had accepted the Akhwan creed. This episode, together with constant rumours that the Akhwan intended to move against the 'Amarat, increased the apprehension of the 'Iraq tribes. In the middle of February Yusuf Beg and the Camel Corps moved out towards Abul Ghar, south of Suq al Shuyukh, where the Mutasarrif paid him a visit and exhorted the tribes not to pay tribute to Ibn Sa'ud. His action probably precipitated the issue. On March 11 the Akhwan leader, Faisal al Duwish, no doubt in collusion with Ibn Suwait, looted Abul Ghar, and, not finding the Camel Corps there, followed them to Shaqrah, some thirty miles south of the Basrah Nasiriyah Railway, and delivered an unprovoked attack on Yusuf Beg's men and the Muntafiq shepherds, who were camped in the vicinity.

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London,
Tuesday Morning.

Italy and Greece.

Any fears of yet another war in the Near East that may have arisen at first as a result of Italy's forceful measures in exacting reparation from Greece have quickly been dissipated. In the first place it takes two to make a war, and Greece is not in a position to stand up to the Italians; secondly, Italy has received too many indications of the bad impression created by her hasty action to make her anxious to proceed to further extremes. It is to be hoped, therefore, that Greece will lose no time in fulfilling the Italian terms with what grace she can. Any attempt to haggle will only increase the temptation in Italy to make the occupation of Corfu permanent. Let Greece concede every other point, and make an offer of £100,000 in the place of the £500,000 demanded.

Turkish Currency.

It is satisfactory to learn that one of the first steps taken by the Turkish Government after the ratification of the Lausanne Treaty is to devote attention to the question of exchange. In this matter Turkey at present, with exchange at about eight Turkish pounds to the English pound, compares favourably with her Balkan neighbours, whose exchanges range from ten to nearly fifty times the parity rate: but the Turkish pound has depreciated somewhat rapidly since the terms of the Lausanne Treaty were fixed, and there is precedent enough to show how difficult it is to stop the downward movement when it has gained any serious momentum. The full effect, moreover, on Turkey's exchange of the withdrawal of the Allied troops from Constantinople has yet to be recorded. In the circumstances the subject is one that brooks of no delay. One proposal attributed to the Angora Government is to redeem annually two million Turkish pounds in paper money, which will gradually be withdrawn from circulation, and to set aside in the Budget a credit of twenty-five million Turkish pounds for debt service and redemption. This scheme, if carried into effect, will be a move in the right direction. At the same time Turkey should define her attitude towards her external debt, and take the opportunity of removing the bad impression caused by her struggle for better terms at Lausanne. There can be little doubt that she will find bondholders ready to meet her halfway, because all countries have an interest in preventing any further spread of depreciated currencies.

The Imperial Bank of India.

The half-yearly results of the Imperial Bank of India for the first six months of the current year provide very satisfactory reading. Net earnings for the period in question amounted to Rs.76,01,175, as compared with Rs. 63,52,241 in the corresponding half of 1922 and Rs. 62,27,800 for the six months ending December, 1922. The dividend is maintained at the previous rate of 16 per cent., free of income tax, and Rs. 12,50,000, as against ten lakhs previously, are added to the reserve fund. Deposits increased from Rs. 63,36,20,604 a year ago to Rs. 70,47,71,973. The Bank stands pledged to open a hundred new branches within five years from January, 1921; of this number, 29 were opened during the halfyear, bringing the total opened to date up to 59.

The Irak Mail Route.

A telegram from Baghdad states that the first dispatch of mail matter by the new motor service between Irak and Palestine left Baghdad last Thursday. I shall be surprised to hear that this marks the inauguration of a regular weekly service, as I was under the impression that the Nairn Transport Company, who have the mail contract, proposed to start on October 1, when their fleet of new cars specially bought for the service would have reached Palestine. Possibly the reference is to a trial trip undertaken to celebrate the formal signing of the contract last week in Baghdad. Mails by this route will be subject to a surcharge of threepence instead of the sixpence charged for the air mail between Cairo and Baghdad. When the Haifa-Baghdad motor service is in regular running order the mails by that route should not take much, if any, longer than the air mail, which is more liable to delay from weather conditions. It is not intended, however, that there should be competition between the two routes. There are good reasons why the Royal Air Force should wish to keep up the fortnightly connection between Cairo and Baghdad; but it may be supposed that it does not set much store on acting as mail carriers. The motor car service via Damascus represents a bold, but I think sound, experiment, and there will be a natural tendency on the part of the Air Force, and, no doubt, of the British Post Office, to stand by to see how the scheme works. When it is fully established the saving of threepence on each letter will quickly deflect the mails to that route. The Irak Post Office is to be congratulated on its enterprise, for the substitution of a weekly postal service over the fortnightly means much to the business world, to say nothing of the saving of time to those who have to travel to and from Irak.

THE SHIPPING EXHIBITION.

Some Notable Exhibits.

(By Our Engineering Representative.)

The Shipping Engineering and Machinery Exhibition, which opened at Olympia on August 31, and may be said to inaugurate the exhibition season, is in every way a remarkable show. As its name indicates, the exhibition is a comprehensive one, and the range of the exhibits is very striking. Besides motor-boats, internal combustion engines, cranes, elevators, and a whole host of machinery of various kinds there are lamps, indicators, electric irons, and measuring apparatus, to mention only a few of the objects on view. Briefly, it is a very representative exhibition of British potentialities in engineering and machinery generally, but though it is so one could not help noticing the absence of a number of the leading firms without whose participation no exhibition of this kind could be considered complete.

There is more room at Olympia this year, and it greatly adds to the effectiveness of the exhibition, for while there is accommodation to spare the general effect is one of spaciousness, which adds greatly to the attractiveness of the exhibits. It has been the drawback of so many recent exhibitions that the stands have been so packed together that it was difficult to see the exhibits for the people. At Olympia it is quite otherwise, which is fortunate in view of the crowds that may be expected owing to the exhibition having a decidedly popular side. It is possible, for instance, to see many varieties of machinery in motion, while the marine section is a perfect feast for the eye. Motor-boats of various kinds are exhibited by a large number of firms, and a morning could easily be spent over these vessels alone. They are small craft, but one of them so little merits that description that it is obvious that it must have been a matter of supreme difficulty to bring it to Olympia. Among these vessels is one which is likely to take more than its share of attention—a strange object somewhat resembling a submarine which has been built specially for speed, and can cover space at a prodigious rate. Looking at it one could not help thinking of Jules Verne. And there are other things in the exhibition only scarcely less interesting. It will be small wonder, therefore, if the younger generation, at any rate, finds the exhibition at least as attractive as any of the many other interests that London has to offer, and certainly youth seemed to predominate on the opening day. But it is, of course, the business visitor who matters, and it is satisfactory to know that the indications point to the presence of a large number of official and other representatives. Thus there is reason to anticipate that the result will be to give an impetus to British trade.

In the case of an exhibition of this size it is, of course, impossible to deal in detail with more than a few exhibits if justice is to be done to any, and I propose, therefore, to touch on some half a dozen of the leading stands, briefly indicating a few of the others that are worth special note.

To my mind there is no question that the most interesting stand in the exhibition is that of Messrs. John I. Thornycroft and Co., Limited, who have a most attractive display of motor-boats, marine and stationary engines, oil fuel gear, ships' models, etc. Of special interest is the Thorny-croft 35 ft. sailing motor-yacht of 9 tons T.M., with hull of mahogany and equipped with a Thornycroft DB/2 type 9 B.H.P. engine. This boat is of similar, but larger, design to the 7-ton Gamecock exhibited at the Motor-Boat Show in 1921, and has been designed for single-handed running, either under power or sail, and has comfortable accommodation for lengthy sea cruising. Other craft shown include a Thornycroft 30 ft. open river launch, representative of many similar boats supplied for service at home and overseas. The marine and stationary engines shown by this firm include the DB/2 7.1/2/9 B.H.P. engines fitted with combined reducing reversing gear, suitable for cabin cruisers, harbour launches, ships' boats, fishing-boats, commercial craft, and auxiliary work generally, and an AB/4 paraffin engine, having four cylinders developing 26/30 B.H.P. fitted with reverse gear and standard stern gear.

This type is particularly suitable for high-speed work generally. The M/4 4-cylinder 30/36 B.H.P. engine is also being shown, one set being fitted with reverse gear and standard stern gear and the other with reducing reversing gear and standard stern gear. For all types of commercial work and cruisers of average tonnage, auxiliary purposes, etc., this engine is suitable. Thornycroft oil fuel burning gear is shown for use on marine or stationary boilers, and examples of Thornycroft propeller work are available, also a comprehensive selection of models and photographs of steam and motor craft built by the firm.

Messrs. Ruston and Hornsby, Limited, show their three-cylinder vertical cold starting oil engine, which will run on the cheapest fuel oils obtainable, either crude, residual, or tar oils. The fuel consumption of this engine under working conditions does not exceed .43 lb. The system adopted renders the starting absolutely reliable even in cold weather, while the design of the engine makes for simplicity of working, and the engine can be easily handled by a man of intelligence.

Messrs. Tayler and Bates, Limited, have a very interesting stand showing a 35 ft. cruiser and a 22 ft. river launch. Messrs. J. W. Brooke and Co., Limited, show a complete range of standard type Brooke marine motors and sets, while the British Petroleum Company, Limited, include among their exhibits models of a tank steamer, a derrick, and a railway tank car, and, of course, details of the various well-known products of the company.

Messrs. the Parsons Marine Turbine Co., Ltd., show a working model of their double-reduction geared turbines, comprising a high and low pressure turbine working in association with double-reduction gearing. They also exhibit a model of an arrangement of geared turbines suitable for a single-screw merchant vessel, and a model of a twin-screw arrangement of geared turbines suitable for a passenger steamer, etc. Messrs. Babcock and Wilcox, Ltd., have a comprehensive exhibit, including a mechanical chain grate stoker of the compartment type, showing the latest developments in these automatic stokers, permitting of the perfect regulation of the air supply to any portion of the grate. The firm are also showing their marine type boiler, which may be arranged for either coal or oil firing; their standard land type water-tube steam boiler, fitted with superheater and chain grate stoker; and samples of their oil-burners, in which steam or air is used as a spraying or atomising agent or in which the oil is atomised mechanically by pressure.

Messrs. the Automatic and Electric Furnaces, Limited, are showing the Wild-Barfield furnace for hardening high-speed steel, which consists of a horizontal heating chamber 9 in. by 5 in. by 3 in. Two bars of recrystallised carborundum are inserted in the roof, and are heated by an electric current from the lighting or heating mains. Their exhibits also include internally heated electric furnaces, and four Wild-Barfield automatic hardening furnaces. Another interesting stand is that of Messrs. Venesta, Limited, who show an exhibit of reinforced plywood under the name of Plymex. Messrs. the Aerograph Co., Limited, show the Aerograph system of using compressed air for the application of paints and varnishes, etc. Another notable stand is that of Messrs. Lacy-Hulbert and Co., Limited, where are to be seen a number of examples of air compressors, vacuum pumps, pneumatic machinery, and appliances. Messrs. W. H. Dorman and Co., Limited, show a single-drill wave power generator, direct coupled to an electric motor, a three-drill wave power generator, driven by a Dorman engine, a self-propelled three-drill wave power plant, and a cradle-mounted rock drill on a tripod. Filters of several kinds are shown by Messrs. the Stream Line Filter, whose exhibits include a large filter capable of dealing with many tons of water per hour. Messrs. Drummond Bros., Limited, show a series of machines and engines named "The Willing Worker," among them a 3 b.h.p. paraffin engine which is entirely self-contained, is hopper cooled, and requires no sub-base, and will start from cold on a small amount of petrol; a concrete mixer which has a capacity of from three to eight cubic yards per hour; and a house lighting set which is suitable for lighting the ordinary country house.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Slightly Easier.

The Commercial Company of Egypt, in their report for the week ending August 24, state:—

Since our last report the Futures market has been slightly easier, although a fair amount of business has been put through. The demand from abroad has improved somewhat, and the orders received from spinners have been more numerous than for a long time past. A point worth mentioning is that the orders have been mostly for prompt shipment, which tends to show that spinners are not too well supplied with cotton. The Government purchases have been small, 150 to 200 bales Sakellarides daily, for which they have paid $1 below November for fully good fair and $1.4 below November for fully good fair to good. The difference between November Sakellarides and October Ashmouni has ranged between $4½ and $5, and the tendency is for the difference to narrow. Stocks, both here and in Liverpool, have now touched the lowest figures of the season; but, as the present demand is mostly for prompt shipment, whilst new crop cotton will not be coming down in any quantity for another month, a further reduction in stock figures is probable. This week's receipts amount to 6,718 krs., and the total since September 1 now stands at 6,643,914 krs. Exports have this week amounted to 55,901 krs., and the stock now stands at 854,736 krs., against 903,919 krs. a week ago, and 1,464,301 krs. a year ago.

Spot.—We have had considerably improved markets at Minet-el-Bassal this week, and spinners have shown more interest than for some time past. Sales amount to about 6,100 bales, of which we estimate 4,500 bales Sakel and 1,600 bales Uppers. In this total are included 700 bales Sakel fully good fair strict and fully good fair to good bought by the Government.

Sakellarides.—All styles have been dealt in, but the bulk of the business has been in the medium and good grades. Prices of spot against contracts are quite firm at last week's rates. Fair and fully fair, being scarce, are rather dearer.

Uppers.—Business has been done in all styles, but the bulk has been in high grades. Spot prices are steady at about last week's rates for grades from fair to fully good fair, none of which are in good supply; but for cotton above fully good fair rates are considerably easier, owing to new crop cotton being now on the market.

Brown and White.—Remain neglected. Spot prices of brown are quoted a little easier, whilst for white they are very firm.

Crop 1923.—Crop news from Upper Egypt is rather good. Cotton is now arriving from there regularly, but, naturally, in small quantities.

It is reported from Lower Egypt that the pink boll worm is on the increase; but it is, as yet, difficult to say whether the damage caused is heavier than last year.

The Marking of Cotton Textiles.

As regards the false folding and marking of cotton textiles, H.M. Commercial Agent in Egypt has now confirmed his telegraphed communication to the Department of Overseas Trade in the following manner:—

"The Commercial Agent states that he has been furnished by the Egyptian Customs Administration with the following particulars, explaining the manner in which they are administering the decree of June 15, 1922, which deals with this matter.

"No substantial amendments have been made in the text of the Decree, but the following rules are being applied provisionally:—

"(1)In general, the length and unit of measurement must be stamped on the material, according to the law, but coloured goods may exceptionally be accepted if the required information is written on a paper label or on the packing.

"(2) Goods bearing a number only, without indication as to whether it refers to yards or metres, shall be dealt with as follows:—

"(a) If the result of verification shows the folds to be in metres, the goods may be imported as they are.

"(b) If the verification shows the folds to be in yards, the word 'Yards' must be added on every piece."

The Commercial Agent further states that the President of the British Chamber of Commerce in Egypt has had conversation with the Egyptian Customs Administration in regard to the execution of the Decree in question.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Inquiry on Satisfactory Scale.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended August 29:—

The inquiry throughout the week has been on quite a satisfactory scale, and the resultant business shows an increase over last week. A further slight hardening in basis has taken place, and quotations for all growths and grades (with the exception of extra fine Sakel, which is reduced 25 points) have been advanced 10 points. A more confident feeling appears to prevail in trade circles, and spinners have shown more inclination to purchase further ahead. The main business continues to run on the medium Sakel qualities, and these, with a sprinkling of transactions in uppers, form the greater portion of the offtake.

Occasional inquiries for the higher grades of Sakel have come in, but only small parcels have changed hands; holders are ready to meet the market when tested. The demand for the Sudan varieties is well maintained, and about 650 bales have been sold at prices ranging from 15.00 to 17⅛. Reports from Alexandria on early arrivals of new crop uppers give a favourable opinion, and we are informed that a large yield of high-grade cotton is confidently expected. The estimated sales for the week amount to 3,400 bales, against 2,500 in our last report. F.G.F. Sakel to-day 16.55d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

A Slight Improvement.

The Manchester cotton trade review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended September 1 states:—

Although the market remains in a state of depression there has been a little more interest shown during the past week. Enquiries from abroad have been numerous, and whilst, as usual, a proportion of these have been quite impracticable, it is probably safe to say that rather more have resulted in actual business than in recent weeks.

The report of the American Agricultural Bureau on the growing cotton crop published last evening, showing a condition of only 54.1, is a great disappointment. If these figures are reliable the crop now cannot under the best circumstances be much more than 11,000,000 bales, and this would not be sufficient to supply the world's spinners on a full-time basis. The predicament of the trade is, therefore, a most awkward one; it is suffering from lack of orders owing to higher prices, yet, if the orders come in the desired quantity there would probably not be enough cotton to fulfil them.

Yarn.—A slightly better tone has been noticeable, but quotations remain very irregular and susceptible to considerable reductions when actual business is in question.

Cloth.—For certain classes of fancy goods a modest business has been done, but for standard lines demand remains exceedingly unsatisfactory. There has been a considerable volume of enquiry, leading many people to believe that on a lower range of values, provided that they were kept fairly steady, quite a good business could be done. In view of the bureau report above referred to, however, it is difficult to see how any reduction can be anticipated in the raw material except one of a very temporary nature.

No individual market calls for special mention.

Raw Cotton.—Prices have kept very steady during the week, and the effect of the bureau report issued last evening has not yet had time to show itself. A rise in the early days of next week seems very probable. Closing prices are as follows: American fully middling, 15.18; Egyptian fully good fair, 16.75.

OIL NOTES.

According to a Reuter message the Chester oil concessions in Turkey have been taken over, as a result of arbitration, by the Ottoman-American Development Company, which is credited with being largely controlled by Canadian interests. Admiral Chester and his associates are to receive £60,000 in cash, which is to be supplied by Canadians, and to retain ten per cent. interest in future profits. Colonel Clayton Kennedy, the head of the Ottoman-American Development Company, has expressed his intention of leaving America for Turkey this week, in order to begin work on the Samsun-Sivas railway before October 1, as stipulated by the concession.

The Chester concessions were not primarily connected with oil, although directed to that end; and it remains to be seen whether it is only the oil concessions that have been taken over by the Ottoman-American Company, or as is indicated by the latter part of the announcement, the whole of the Chester concessions.

The over-production of crude oil in America at the present times throws a lurid light on the predictions of the rapid exhaustion of the American oilfields that are launched from time to time for political purposes. American States are now producing on an average 2,250,000 barrels a day, as compared with 1,500,000 barrels a year ago. No doubt, this state of affairs will not last; it would not be in the interest of the companies that it should. But whether over-production will cease because, as some hold, the wells are becoming exhausted, or because, as others suggest, prices are being forced down to discourage production, must remain to be seen. Certainly petrol prices have been cut, and oil share quotations in America are showing the effect. On the other hand, it may be a fact that the fear entertained a few years ago that the United States was not going to be able to produce all the oil needed by their public sent a large number of people into the producing business, of which the results are only now being reaped. As wells do reach their zenith and then gradually fall off, it is possible that the phenomenal output to-day marks that particular stage, and will be inevitably followed by a smaller production, regardless of market operations.

A study of the movement of Roumanian oil shares has raised the question whether a deteriorating currency is an asset or the reverse from the point of view of sterling investments in oil property. Thus, to take the quotations in lei of the shares of a number of Roumanian companies for mid-August and mid-July respectively (the nominal value of the share being given in brackets):—Steaua-Romana (500) 4,850, 4,675; Astra-Romana (500), 8,600, 7,000; Astra-Romana (new), 8,500, 7,000; Sperantza (500), 7,800, 6,750; Concordia (250) 3,460, 2,300; Petrolul Romanesc (500), 1,675, 1,500. All these show on paper substantial improvements in the calendar month, but the real position could only be gauged by correlating the movement with that of the leu exchange, and of the prices of materials, labour, etc.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

The Khedivial Mail Steamship Company announce that their express steamers, Famaka and Fezara, carrying on the mail service between Alexandria and Constantinople, are, both outwards and homewards, again calling regularly at Smyrna. These calls had been for some months discontinued owing to the disturbed political conditions.

British Consular Reports.

VII.—EGYPT.

The following extracts are taken from the report of the British Commercial Agent for Egypt, Mr. E. Homan Mulock, on the economic and financial situation of Egypt in 1922 :—

The year 1922, as compared with its three post-Armistice predecessors which have formed the subject of these annual reports, has been mediocre and unsatisfying in spite of indications to the contrary, such as a favourable trade balance, large exports of cotton, and a considerable budget surplus on March 31, 1923, the end of the financial year 1922-23.

During the years 1919 to 1922 inclusive the trade balance has varied between an excess of exports and re-exports combined over imports of £E32 million in 1919, and an unfavourable balance of trade of about 13 millions, in each of the years 1920 and 1921, concluding with a return in 1922 to the favourable situation of 1919, though with the very much smaller margin of just over £E 8 million.

The total foreign trade of Egypt fell from nearly £E 98 million in 1921 to just under £E 94¾ million in 1922, but this decline, though unsatisfactory from an economic point of view, is as nothing compared with the fall in 1921 from over 190 millions in 1920, to which the total had risen from well over 127 millions in 1919.

It is true that both the quantity and value of exports of cotton have increased during the year 1922 as against 1921, and in the 1921-22 cotton season as compared with that of 1920-21, but although the total quantity exported in the year 1922 was appreciably above the average for the years 1919 to 1921, the corresponding value does not compare at all favourably with the average value for the same three years, and the increase in quantity in 1922 over 1921 is not accompanied by so great a proportionate increase in value as one might be led to expect from so large a demand. This is even more so in the case of the 1921-22 cotton season, as compared with that of 1920-21, since, as the result of an increase in value of 65 per cent. as compared with a 70 per cent. increase in quantity, the price per kantar fell from £E 6.844 mms. to £E 6.631 or $34.21 to $33.15.

Weekly spot prices at Minet-el-Bassal, Alexandria, both of Sakellarides and Ashmouni (taking the Fully Good Fair grade in each case), have varied but slightly since, in spite of the former variety reaching a maximum level of $40.50 and a minimum figure of $29.50, both occurring in January, 1923, the mean for the year of weekly maxima and minima was only $35.79 and $33.02 respectively, while the corresponding figures for Ashmouni were only $26.54 and $24.75 in spite of a maximum of $31.25 and a minimum of $20.50 having been reached, also both in January, 1923.

Decline of Sakellarides Cotton.

A far more significant and disquieting feature of cotton prices during the period under review in this report is the narrowing of the margin that normally exists between the values of Sakellarides and Ashmouni on the one hand, and between that of Sakellarides and American cotton on the other. The normal difference between the Fully Good Fair grade of the two chief varieties of Egyptian cotton is from $10 to $12 per kantar, for both spot and futures, but during 1922 this margin fell from about $9 in January to about $6 in December, and dropped as low as $2 in February, 1923, rising again to about $3 on March 31.

A still more serious situation arises as the result of the narrowing of the premium between Sakellarides Good Fair and American Fully Middling. During 1922 the maximum weekly difference in dollars per kantar between the prices at Liverpool fell from $18.32 on January 6 to $5.45 on December 1, while the minimum fell from $11.89 in May to $3.70 in December. Similarly, as regards maximum weekly spot prices in pence per pound at Liverpool, the margin of 9.11d. on January 6, 1922, when Sakel stood at 20.50d. and American at 11.39d., fell to 2.40d. on December 8, when Sakel had declined to 16.75d. and American had risen to 14.35d.; and it may be of interest to note that on November 10, when American reached the highest weekly spot price recorded for the year 1922—viz., 15.65d., Sakel only stood at 18.40d., thus giving a margin of only 2.75d. This state of affairs is presumably in sympathy with the narrowing of the premium between Fully Good Fair Sakel and Middling American, which is due to the comparatively increased demand for short-stapled cotton, owing to the decreased buying power of the consumer; short-stapled cotton being used for necessities and finer cotton for articles of luxury. In addition, short-stapled cotton has to a large extent replaced long-stapled in the manufacture of tyres, especially in America.

The effect of this state of affairs on the economic situation of Egypt will be far-reaching if it tends to increase the cultivation of Ashmouni and shorter staple cottons on a considerable scale at the expense of Sakel, which can only hold its own with its more prolific Egyptian rivals so long as the margin of price is commensurate with the difference in yield per feddan (acre). Diminished cultivation of Sakel is therefore a contingency that must be envisaged and may have to be faced as a result of a persistent lack of demand or at best a fitful or unremunerative demand for this variety of cotton, which, although only introduced for the first time in 1911 has so far virtually superseded all other varieties, and assured Egypt's unchallenged supremacy as a producer of cotton for the finer counts.

Suffice it to say that in lower Egypt, where the proportion of Sakel averaged nearly 92 per cent. during the years 1917-21 and rose to about 97 per cent. in 1922, the percentage of varieties other than Sakel that is being sown this (1923-24) season is as high as 20 per cent. as against only about 3 per cent. in 1922-23.

It is quite impossible, assuming that so epoch-making and radical a change and reversal in cotton cultivation in Egypt does take place, to gauge or foresee how long the process would require, but the rise of Sakellarides itself, from obscurity in 1911 to undisputed prominence in 1915 and increasing supremacy over all other varieties from that year onwards, is a concrete instance of the rapidity with which an outstanding variety is capable of progressing in popular favour, while the complete fall from grace of Mit Afifi during the years 1906 to 1914 and onwards may be taken as a possible indication of the fate that may await Sakellarides. Expressed in terms of percentages of the total areas under cotton in given years, the changes in the positions of Sakel and Mit Afifi were as follows :—Sakel rose from 7 per cent. in 1911 to about 47 per cent. in 1915—which was the lion's share in view of other varieties sharing the balance—and thence to 72.5 per cent. in 1918 and 77 per cent. in 1921, while Mit Afifi fell from 77 per cent. in 1906 to 50 per cent. in 1911, thence to 18 per cent. in 1915, and 2½ per cent. in 1918 and onwards, having actually reached in 1916, and since then maintained a lower level of percentages of cotton area than all secondary varieties, i.e., those other than Sakel and

Ashmouni, which latter variety has never risen above 22 per cent. of the total.

The official estimate of crop visible on December 26, 1922, was 4,900,000 kantars, which allows a yield per feddan of only 2.72 kantars over a total area of 1,800,000 feddans. Assuming that 3.50 kantars per feddan is a fair and conservative basis for calculation, this figure would give an acreage of 1,400,000 for a crop of 4,900,000 kantars, which would constitute a genuine restricted area. Alternatively, applying the same basis of yield per feddan to the actual acreage of 1,801,843, the total crop for the 1922-23 season becomes 6,306,450 kantars, and the total yield 6,595,450 kantars.

The vagaries of demand are too well known to make it possible to forecast how much cotton will be exported between April 21 and August 31, 1923, but there would seem to be good grounds for hoping that the carry-over to 1923-24 will not be large; the more this hope is realised, the greater the chances of a rise in cotton prices during the 1923-24 season, resulting from the supply available being limited to or not much more than the crop that can be expected from a properly restricted area, so long as the yield per feddan tends to decrease, or at best, remain at a level appreciably lower than the average of pre-war years which, during the four quinquennial periods comprised in the years 1895 to 1914, fell from 5.47 kantars per feddan to 4.27. Many reasons are given by experts for the decline in the yield of cotton, but not the least of these is the lack of drainage in certain areas, which will not be adequately remedied so long as economies are effected at the expense of irrigation and drainage in Egyptian budgets.

Imports.

The decrease, amounting to over £E12 millions (viz., nearly 22 per cent.), which places imports about £E14½ millions below the average for the years 1917-21, is principally due to supplies of cereals having dropped to less than one-third of those of 1921, and to a considerable decline in imports of coal and metalware.

Owing to the greatly decreased imports of coal, wheat, and wheat flour, the United States constituted the country principally responsible for the total decrease in the value of imports, but the decline in the demand for these three commodities also considerably affected the value of imports from Australia and New Zealand, with a corresponding adverse effect on the share of the British Empire in total imports, in spite of an increase in supplies and value of wheat flour from the United Kingdom, and of so great an improvement in her position as a supplier of coal that, whereas the United States of America's share of the total quantity imported in 1921 was 42 per cent. and fell in 1922 to 8 per cent., the share of the United Kingdom rose from 46 per cent. to 91 per cent.

It is true that the decrease in imports from the United Kingdom is not large, relatively speaking, but it is serious in view of the fact that it constitutes a further downward step in the steady decline in the percentages of the British Empire in the total imports into Egypt that has been a feature of the years 1919 to 1922 inclusive.

It is earnestly to be hoped that United Kingdom manufacturers will not delude themselves into thinking that they are in no way to blame for this shrinkage of British trade, and that it is entirely due to external factors such as general trade depression and the difficulty of competing with low currency countries, as well as to internal factors, as being partly contributory to the decline in total trade. The comparison of British and foreign commercial activities and methods of business clearly indicates that, inter alia, the lack of consideration for, and support of, their agents or representatives, as well as the apathy towards the Egyptian market, that are shown by many British manufacturers, are to an appreciable extent responsible for the success of their foreign competitors, and the consequent gradual lessening of the foothold therein which in pre-war years constituted so marked and invariable a feature of British trade with Egypt.

Customs statistics are not yet available giving each country's inclusive total share for 1922 of each commodity it imports into Egypt, and, failing these as the only means of accurately comparing United Kingdom imports for 1921 and 1922 in detail, in this summary it is only possible to mention the most conspicuous instances of the amounts representing approximate thousands of £E which help to swell the total decrease in 1922 of £E2,206,144. These are: machines and parts not otherwise enumerated, 244; wrought iron or steel pipes and fittings, 199; cotton piece goods, printed, heavy, 170; printed, light, 27; ditto grey, light, 100; tinplate for petroleum tins, 143; household soap, 138; stationary internal-combustion engines, 87; iron and steel axles, wheels and springs, 80; bars or billets, 48; sheets or plates, 40; and iron or steel articles not otherwise enumerated, 43; sewing cotton in reels, 75; beer and whisky, 58; rails, 57; timber, 55; cotton clothing, 46, ready-made woollen clothing, 44; power pumps, 41. It is important to note that, as there were increases of varying dimensions in other kinds of goods, the total decrease in British imports above quoted is only the net decrease—a fact which makes the decline in British exports to Egypt all the more serious. The British Empire, whose imports have decreased by £E5 millions; the United States, which has dropped from over £E8 millions in 1921 to just over £E1½ million in 1922; and China, with a decline of half a million, are responsible for the shrinkage of imports by about £E12 millions.

The losses sustained both by the Camel Corps and the tribesmen were heavy, but, in view of the very serious portent implied by the opening of hostilities with Ibn Sa'ud, I judged it necessary to obtain the instructions of His Majesty's Government, while keeping the Akhwan camp under aerial observation. On March 14, however, aeroplanes were heavily fired upon, and orders were, therefore, given for immediate measures in retaliation.

I lost no time in warning Ibn Sa'ud that the situation which had arisen was one of extreme gravity, and received from him an assurance that the Akhwan had acted without his authority, together with expressions of his deep regret for what had occurred and of his determination to inflict punishment on those who should be proved guilty. I acquainted His Majesty the King and His Highness the Naquib with the contents of this communication, which, together with my letter to Ibn Sa'ud, was published in the local papers. Meantime I had received instructions from His Majesty's Government to proceed with negotiations in the matter of the treaty between 'Iraq and Najd, and to inform Ibn Sa'ud that temporarily the frontier between the two States should be considered to run along the lines I had previously indicated to him, i.e., including the wells and pasturages of the Dhafir, Muntafiq, and 'Amarat 'Anizah.

GOLD PRODUCTION IN ROUMANIA.

The Roumanian Ministry of Industry publishes statistical data regarding the gold and silver output of Transylvania since the Armistice. In 1919 the amount of gold produced was 733 kilogrammes, in 1920 707 kilogrammes, in 1921 1,104 kilogrammes, and in 1922 a total of 1,337 kilogrammes was recorded. The silver production, which was 2,331 kilogrammes in 1919 and 2,135 kilogrammes in 1920, advanced to 2,862 kilogrammes in 1921, and fell to 1,954 kilogrammes in 1922.

The continual increase of gold production since 1920, it is pointed out, is largely due to the under-valuation of the Roumanian exchange as compared with its internal purchasing power. The consequence of this under-valuation was that the increase of the price of gold was greater than the increase of wages and other mining cost items. Consequently it was worth while to work mines which had been abandoned, because under normal conditions of equilibrium between home prices and exchange rates their yield was inferior to the cost of production. The mine at Zalatna is a case in point; it has recently been reopened, and its output is estimated at 50 kilogrammes per day. It may be anticipated, therefore, that the gold production for 1923 will be well in advance of that of 1922.

COTTON IN IRAK.

In the Report by Sir Percy Cox on the Administration of Irak (October, 1920—March, 1922) which has just been published, there are interesting references to the subject of cotton.

District work in the Baghdad area, the report states, was concentrated mostly on the Saqlawiyah and Yusufiyah canals, where it was anticipated there would be a good chance of cotton propaganda succeeding. Owing to adverse circumstances the crop on both canals was a distinct failure. Not only on the two mentioned canals, but elsewhere, the yields of cotton were very disappointing. This was due in part to exceptionally hot winds and consequent shortage of water, but the main difficulty lies as yet in the ignorance of the cultivators.

Late in the season a revised estimate of 350 bales was anticipated, but the total yield only amounted to about 60 bales. Thus the whole country produced less than was grown on 80 acres the previous year. It is unpleasant to have to admit defeat in the cotton season of 1921, but it must be remembered that this was the first year in which active propaganda had been undertaken, although much had been written about cotton previously. Irak undoubtedly holds out immense possibilities for the cultivation of cotton, but it is essential to bear in mind that progress will of necessity be slow. No useful purpose would be served by undue optimism, a fact which is likely to be again illustrated in 1922. The Yusufiyah area will probably yield promising quantities of cotton, but elsewhere reports are less favourable. Propaganda should be continued on areas like Yusufiyah, where cultivators are at last responding to instructions, and it is interesting to observe how in this area particular attention is paid to ridging the land before sowing. Wherever cotton has been cultivated on ridges the results have been good, whereas there have been nothing but failures reported wherever cotton has been grown on the flat.

DRIED FRUIT REPORT.

Messrs. J. C. Houghton and Co., of Liverpool, report as follows under date September 1:—

Currants.—Business was of the same restricted character, although on the whole an improvement in tone was noticeable. This was due to smaller estimates being mentioned for the new crop, mainly attributed to ravages and damage by worms. Later reports of the growing crop reduced the estimated yield to the very small figure of 85,000 tons, and from this there will be a further reduction of 15 per cent. for retention purposes; of course, if it is assumed that the consumption will equal that of previous years, there would be scarcely any doubt about a currant shortage. The anxiety manifested at the close of last month became more accentuated in the early days of August, some sellers becoming very insistent in their efforts to effect sales, and cleaned Amalias fruit was forced down to 50s., Gulf, Panariti and Vostizza also declined 6s. per cwt. Latest sales show an advance of 3s. per cwt. from the lowest. Further arrivals per "Pavia" and "Grodno" consisting of 650 tons were marketed, and considerable sales of Vostizza at 60s., 61s. were effected out of the latter steamer. New crop quotations seem now to depend almost entirely on the fluctuating exchange: ranging from 50s. c.i.f. for Pyrgos to as low at 40s. c.i.f., the latest price being 45s. c.i.f. for prompt shipment.

Raisins.—The Valencia crops have suffered great damage through the extreme heat which prevailed at the critical period of maturing, and latest estimates are as low as 5,000 tons, and in addition fully 15 per cent. will be unfit for export. Capes have benefited by the Valencia misfortune, and all arrivals have been absorbed as quickly as they were available at rising quotations. Latest sales are: Good average, 48s.; Fair, 44s. to 45s.; Third Grade, 32s. (in bags). Australian Lexias have also appreciated, selling at 42s. 6d.

Sultanas.—Notwithstanding the continued reports of the neglect of the vines through shortage of labour in Smyrna, the heavy stocks in the United Kingdom have caused holders to insist on making progress, and the downward movement has become more pronounced. Some excellent coloured, fresh keeping qualities passed into consumption at 54s. to 56s.; lower grades selling at 50s. to 53s.

Figs.—Practically no interest is being taken in forward quotations. Genuine Naturals quoted 23s. to 25s. c.i.f.

THE PLUM CROP IN BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA.

The Department of Overseas Trade has received from the Acting British Cousul at Sarajevo a report, based on information received from the local Chamber of Commerce, which states that the total crop of plums in Bosnia and Herzegovina is estimated to yield this year 250,000 tons, which will presumably be disposed of as follows:—2,000 tons to meet the requirements of the local market, 5,000 tons of chosen hand-picked plums to be exported abroad as dessert fruit, 3,000 tons to be employed for the fabrication of marmalade (pekmez), 50,000 tons to pass through the process of torrefaction, which will yield 20,000 tons of dried plums mainly intended for the purpose of exportation; the remainder of the crop to be used for the fabrication of a sort of brandy called "sljivovica" or "rakija."

It is anticipated that the plums of this season will be of a medium size, and, owing to their normal development, the sound consistency of the flesh, and considerable contents of saccharin substances, it is hoped that they will be able to stand even long transports by sea. The local Chamber of Commerce is prepared to give gratis any information which may be required in connection with the exportation of plums.

CROP PROSPECTS IN YUGOSLAVIA.

The Commercial Secretary at Belgrade has informed the Department of Overseas Trade that, according to local Press reports, the grain crops this year are regarded as very satisfactory both from the point of view of quality and quantity. Wheat is calculated this year at 82 kilogrammes per hectare and barley at 76-78 per hectare. It is estimated that considerable quantities of cereals will be available for export.

It is stated that, with a view to fostering the milling industry, wheat will not be exported except in the form of flour. The mills in this country are equipped on modern lines, and therefore able to deal with very large quantities. Before the war Serbian flour was exported to Austria, Germany, Switzerland, England, Holland, Brazil, etc., and it is claimed that the quality is now equal to the most exacting demands.

The fruit crops are no less satisfactory. The last census of fruit trees in Yugoslavia in 1921 gave the following results:—Plum trees, 59,023,768; apple trees, 6,909,601; pear trees, 3,884,113; nut trees, 1,471,648; olive trees, 3,250,270; sundry trees, 4,855,880.

The estimates for this year's yield are:—Grapes, 5,000,000 kilogrammes; plums, 12,000,000; apples, 16,000,000; and pears, 1,000,000 kilogrammes.

A general strike, says The Times Smyrna correspondent, has begun on the Ottoman Aidin Railway, and unless it is rapidly settled it will be a great blow to the dried fruit trade, which is now in full swing. Further labour troubles are feared.

The figures for the three months ended June were:—Total exports, Rs.90.62 lakhs (against Rs.70.51 lakhs for the corresponding quarter); and imports, Rs.58.36 lakhs (against Rs.52.96 lakhs).

Company Meetings.

AFRICAN AND EASTERN TRADE CORPORATION, LTD.

Annual Ordinary General Meeting.

Mr. J. H. Batty (chairman of directors) presided over the annual ordinary general meeting of the African and Eastern Trade Corporation, Ltd., which was held last Friday at Liverpool. There was a full attendance of directors and a large gathering of shareholders.

The Chairman, in his opening remarks, referred to the loss the West African trade had sustained by the death of Mr. Geo. Miller so soon after that of Mr. Alexander Miller, the founders of Miller Brothers (of Liverpool), Ltd., and Millers, Ltd., of London.

Continuing, the Chairman said the trading results for the twelve months under review had been again seriously affected by the continuance of the profound depression in trade experienced during the previous year. The market conditions in West Africa and elsewhere were in a much healthier state now; there were indications that the greater part of the surplus stocks had been realised, and that merchants generally were enabled to turn their attention more directly to making profits than to the liquidation of stocks. Produce markets had been, and were still, overshadowed by the adverse influence of the French occupying the Ruhr district. The immediate outlook gave the directors much anxiety, as the political position was more acute to-day than twelve months ago, and it was no use closing one's eyes to the fact that Germany industrially was being paralysed, and the wealth of a nation could rapidly be reduced to vanishing point by diminished output, and that was what was happening in Germany to-day. In pre-war days Germany was their best customer, and was practically the largest consumer of African raw material, and they had to find new markets for the produce exported from West Africa. One redeeming feature was the steady improvement in the economic conditions of Russia and Austria. Surveying the position as a whole, they could not look to any real revival of trade, or expect that the wheels of commerce would revolve harmoniously as in the past, until their politicians had effected a permanent settlement of all the international problems before them.

After surveying the figures in the balance-sheet (which showed a balance to the credit of profit and loss account of £452,455), the Chairman referred to the corporation's option on four oil concessions in the district of Half Assinie, in the Gold Coast Colony, comprising an area of some 150 square miles, and that a party consisting of two geologists had been despatched to investigate and report. As a result of their report, drilling engineers and boring plant were sent out, and the last report indicated that Well No. 1 was down 1,100 ft. and Well No. 2 1,300 ft. They were given to understand that oil may be struck at any time after reaching 2,000 ft., and the indications so far might be looked upon as favourable, and everybody on the spot was optimistic. Should they be so fortunate as to strike oil in payable quantities, it would materially add to the development and prosperity of this Colony. He felt it would be of immense advantage to the West African colonies and the trade in general if the Secretary of State for the Colonies would appoint an independent committee to investigate the whole system of administration and expenditure in these colonies. Such a committee would collect invaluable data which would prove of great assistance both to the administrators out there, the Colonial Office here, and the community as a whole. Just recently a "Private Enterprise" committee had been appointed by the Secretary of State, its purpose being to endeavour to encourage private enterprise and British capital to improve and develop transport facilities in West Africa. He hoped that the finding of this committee would revolutionise the policy of the past twenty-five years, which endeavoured to open up the interior of Africa by State railways, constructed departmentally. He attached great importance to the ultimate outcome of the Imperial Economic Conference to meet in October next, and he trusted that as a result they might get nearer to arriving at some practical method of improving production within the British Empire.

There was a movement on foot to establish an Imperial agricultural college on similar lines to the School of Tropical Medicine, so that they might have students within the equatorial belt highly trained in tropical agriculture, and who would be available throughout their tropical dependencies for the purpose of teaching and increasing the produce needed for the European markets. This project should receive their hearty support, and, if properly directed, might prove the foundation of a school of immense value, and greatly increase the available amount of raw material. They had in front of them a possible danger in the palm oil cultivation in Sumatra, and they might find, within the next ten or fifteen years, the cultivated oil palm ousting the wild indigenous oil palm in West Africa. The chambers of commerce had recommended to the Colonial Office the formation of a committee consisting of officials, experts, and merchants to investigate and put forward recommendations for the purpose of educating the native to use some intelligence and care in protecting and improving the oil palm in West Africa. In conclusion, the Chairman paid a warm tribute to the work of the staff both at home and abroad, and proposed the adoption of the report and accounts, which included the declaration of a final dividend of 4 per cent. (less tax), payable on October 1.

Mr. Robt. B. Miller (Vice-Chairman) seconded, and the resolution was carried by a large majority.

The retiring directors (Messrs. Robt. B. Miller, Lieut.-Col. W. Nicholl, Mazzini Stuart, and John Tunnicliffe) were unanimously re-elected.

The auditors (Messrs. Harmood Banner and Son) were re-appointed.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman terminated the proceedings.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Liquidating the Crisis.

At the moment of writing, the Græco-Italian crisis is in a fair way to being liquidated. The Conference of Ambassadors has formulated its demands upon Greece, which bear a certain resemblance to the terms of the Italian ultimatum, and these have been accepted both by Greece and Italy. The Italian terms, it may be well to recall, were regarded as severe, but, with the single exception of the amount of the indemnity claimed, they were such as no responsible person would have counselled Greece in the circumstances to reject. The Ambassadors' terms emphasise the fact that the Janina murders were an outrage on the three Allied Powers, and associate Great Britain and France with Italy in the reparations and sanctions demanded. Greece is to carry out an investigation into the murders under the supervision of an Allied Commission, of which the Japanese delegate is to be the president; she is called to pay an indemnity the amount of which shall be determined in summary procedure by the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague, and in the meantime has to deposit (as she had already undertaken to do) a sum of fifty million Italian lire in the Swiss National Bank as caution money for this purpose.

The Moral?

As Europe's main concern is to pour oil on the troubled waters and to be rid of the crisis, there would seem to be no point in attempting to determine which of the two parties gains or loses more by these terms. It is to be hoped that not only Greece, but also all other countries where frontier lawlessness has been connived at, will learn from the incident that the policy does not pay. Not the least fault that could be found with the Italian ultimatum, as was pointed out in these columns last week, was that it concerned itself solely with the Janina outrage, and made no attempt to deal with the conditions which made such a crime possible. It would have been more in the interests of Europe if the penalty imposed upon Greece, instead of aiming at her humiliation, had compelled her to put an end for all time to the komitaji bands, which, in the different Balkan States, are mainly responsible for the unhappy reputation of the Peninsula. The Ambassadors' terms also fail to deal with the komitaji question. As far as Italy is concerned, there can be little doubt that she would have lost nothing, but, on the contrary, would have enhanced her prestige, and avoided a certain amount of odium, if she had in the first instance called upon the Conference of Ambassadors to deal with the matter. Unless Greece continues to live up to the phenomenal wisdom that she has shown in meeting the crisis, there is just a fear that her people will lose sight of the crime and the danger it entailed in the elation over having, as they may interpret it, their point of view vis-à-vis Italy endorsed.

The League of Nations.

A great pother is being made over the position of the League of Nations in regard to the Græco-Italian crisis. Italy is represented as having dealt a fatal blow to the League, and the latter is blamed for having blundered into its own undoing. Reflection, we imagine, will show that the quidnuncs who argue thus are quite wide of the mark. The object of the League of Nations, as set forth in the preamble to the covenant, is "to promote international co-operation and to achieve international peace and security," and so long as the end in view is attained it matters little who the immediate agent is. In the League the world has a recognised tribunal always at hand to which it can refer its disputes, and in the present instance the League fully played its part. The member against whom an appeal is lodged may often be tempted to dispute its jurisdiction; but its object remains the same, and it must be guided in its action by the one desire "to achieve international peace and security." In the case of the Græco-Italian dispute, it was obvious at the outset that the quickest route to peace lay through the Conference of Ambassadors, and it would have been folly on the part of the Council of the League to have refrained from using the Conference as its medium to peace. Strictly speaking, the occupation of Corfu comes within the competence of the League alone, but the latter can turn a blind eye to this point if evacuation follows on the fulfilment of the Ambassadors' demands. Of course, the League has not yet reached its full stature, and it may be conceded that it is not yet in a position to cope with mutiny on the part of any Great Power. But Europe, and, above all, the small States, have every reason to be thankful that the League is in existence. The terms of its Covenant provided a rallying-point for public opinion outraged by the crimes of Janina and Corfu, and the incident, we believe, far from weakening the League, will indirectly strengthen it by reminding those who feel strong enough to flout it that they will incur the condemnation of the whole world.

Italy and Great Britain.

We yield to none in the desire for the maintenance and strengthening of Anglo-Italian friendship, and we do not believe that when the crisis arising from the Janina murders has subsided, the relations between the two countries will be found to have been impaired. The provocation to Italy is admitted, and having regard to the difference in the Italian and the British temperament and to conditions in Italy, it may not be a matter for surprise that the Italian Government should have acted as it did. It would, however, have been a bad day for Great Britain and the world if the Italian action had not immediately roused British reprobation. There was no desire, it may be repeated, to belittle the Janina crime; that stood so self-condemned that comment upon it seemed almost superfluous, and the field was left open to a consideration solely of Italian action at Corfu. The instinct that made British opinion rally to the League of Nations was in every way sound. Too much contempt cannot be poured upon the doctrine that no act nor policy of another country must be judged on its merits, but must be considered entirely in the light of the amount of trade between Great Britain and that country. In spite of the fact that there is every reason why the British Government should wish not to alienate Italian goodwill at this particular moment, we believe that a more equivocal attitude over the Græco-Italian crisis would have been a grave disservice to the friendship between the two peoples.

The Fiume Problem.

Signor Mussolini seems to be bent upon harrowing Europe's nerves. Before she has settled her quarrel with Greece, Italy may find herself involved in fresh complications with Yugoslavia over Fiume. Dissatisfied with the slowness of the progress made by the Italo-Yugoslav commission engaged in elaborating a settlement of the Fiume question, the Italian Prime Minister sent a message to the delegates embodying his own proposals for a solution, and a suggestion that the Yugoslav Government should give a Yea or Nay answer by September 15. Judged by the new standard of international communications, it might not be fair to call this message to the Joint Commission an ultimatum; but Yugoslavia appears to credit Signor Mussolini with being a man of decisive action, and is reported to be taking steps not to be caught napping when she refuses to accept the proposed settlement. There cannot be the least doubt that the Fiume problem is capable only of solution by agreement. High-handed action, even if it imposes a so-called settlement despite Yugoslavia, will not bring progress or prosperity to Fiume, nor for that matter to Trieste. The fate of these two ports is linked up with the hinterland, and they can flourish only under a régime which identifies the interests of the ports, the railways and the interior. How far Italy and Yugoslavia are from a settlement on these lines does not need to be stated. It would be, however, a worthy goal for both countries.

The New Turkey.

With the submission of its programme of reforms to the National Assembly, the Angora Government enters upon the serious business of the reconstruction of Turkey. The comprehensiveness of its programme is a measure of the task awaiting it; but the fact that in his speech to the Assembly the Prime Minister placed financial matters in the foreground and expressed a readiness to engage foreign experts for administrative departments calling for specialist knowledge is of the best augury. Another noticeable point was the brief formal reference to Turkey's foreign relations—an indication that with the ratification of the Lausanne Treaty the Government recognises that its main preoccupation for the present will be internal reorganisation. If the determination to exterminate brigandage results in the introduction of law and order on the Syrian and Irak frontiers, Turkey will be setting a useful example to her Balkan neighbours. Finally, special attention is to be paid to education. Higher education is to be encouraged by sending students to Europe, and equal importance is to be attached to the education of girls as to that of boys. If care can be taken that the reforming zeal shall not be allowed to cool off, the new Turkey is starting under favourable auspices.

Cyprus.

The so-called National Council of Greeks in Cyprus, which represents those who are clamouring for union with Greece and others who find it politic to associate themselves with the movement, has been kept busy with protests against the new Education Bill and against the answer of the British Government to the latest memorial presented a few weeks ago by a delegate in London. It has recorded the "bitter disappointment of the country" at the Colonial Secretary's reply and has decided "to continue to pursue union with Greece." Safe in the knowledge that Mussolinis are not encouraged in the British Empire, and that Greece is not likely to compromise her relations with Great Britain by supporting the movement, the leaders of the union agitation can continue to keep themselves prominently before the islanders. Some appreciation of the fact that their past policy has not advanced the interests of Cyprus seems to have dawned upon them, and on the top of its stereotyped protests the "National Council" has declared itself willing to accept the proposed increase in the number of Greek seats in the Legislative Assembly. It requires, however, the present Assembly to be dissolved. Any return to reasonableness on the part of the Greek agitators will certainly find the British authorities ready to meet them. What would redound most of all to their credit would be the candid recognition, without sacrificing their desire for union with Greece, that world conditions at the present time are such that the question cannot possibly be held to come within the range of practical politics. They could then settle down quietly to co-operate with the British Government for the good of the island in the hope that circumstances beyond their control will ultimately make union feasible.

The Indian Elections.

Viewed from this distance, the prospects of the forthcoming elections in India cannot be described as particularly encouraging to the supporters of progressive constitutional development. A well-informed correspondent writes, indeed, of a marked growth of public interest, but since he measures the advance only by the number of candidates, it is clear that he, like so many Indians, is thinking in terms of politicians rather than electors, while it is as difficult as ever to distinguish any clear dividing lines in the programmes put forward by individuals. As is usual in such cases, candidates appear to be engaged chiefly in attempting to outbid each other in violence of language, or appeals to ignorant prejudice, and to be steering as clear as possible of anything which can fairly be described as constructive. Perhaps the newspapers tell us something less than the truth, for many Indian journalists are still apt to lay stress on what appeals to them personally rather than on matters which really interest the public, but, on the evidence they furnish, it looks very much as if the elections are to consist largely in a choice of language, if not of lungs.

Programmes of Destruction.

The examples of violence of language which reach us are much too numerous to be worth reproducing in the mass, but we notice that one worthy gentleman has high hopes of a policy for "bringing England to her knees," while another is burning with zeal to "strike a blow at the Empire," an institution of which he has obviously an imperfect comprehension. Such outbursts are apparently regarded in India merely as so many efforts to catch the votes of the ignorant, and if that view is correct, we are driven to the conclusion that the country has made an exceedingly poor use of the new opportunities for political advance, since either the speakers misjudge the electorate, or the electorate has not yet mastered the first letters of the alphabet of democracy. On the whole we incline to the optimistic view that the former alternative is nearer the truth, and that politicians, who are normally rather stupid folk, are still following the course they found convenient in the old days when an electorate did not exist, overlooking the fact that people who have power want to use it, and that something in the nature of a constructive policy is required under the conditions which now prevail.

A Constructive Lead.

From this point of view the most encouraging programme which has appeared so far is that of the Bengal Constitutional League, organised by Mr. S. R. Das, who stands for the policy of working the new Constitution for all it is worth, not worrying too much over demands for its amendment, but using the wide powers which already exist to pass much-needed measures of social and economic reform. The League seems to be making headway among the quick-witted inhabitants of Bengal, and it will be a most satisfactory result if Mr. Das finds himself at the head of a party sufficiently strong to influence Ministers, who have hitherto lacked any ballast of the kind. Not the least attractive item in his programme is the relegation to its proper place of the demand for "Indianisation," irrespective of the capacity of individuals for the work to be done. There are signs, indeed, that this cry is decreasing in popularity, and it is possible that by and by the whole group of service questions may be transferred from practical politics, where they do not belong, to the more appropriate region of administrative detail; but, apart from this particular item, the programme may be summed up as directed to putting Bengal on its feet, a line of action which most of us will prefer to the alternative of bringing England to her knees.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

Italy and Britain.

It is evident that we are simply not going to be allowed to ignore, as we would, the existence of other peoples; foreign matters, such as the Japanese calamity and the Italian occupation of Corfu, obtrude themselves without any chance of being neglected. Over the Japanese affair no two opinions are possible, and sympathy everywhere is at least expressed; but over the Italian business you may hear all kinds of passionate argument. It is true that almost the whole British Press has been against the later actions of Signor Mussolini, but that, I think, does not count for much. As soon as the Press is unanimous you may suspect it; very certainly no such love for the League of Nations is actually entertained by most of those journals which are now professing it. Except by the academic Liberals and the sentimentalists no one in England until the present occasion had much use for the League; nor, moreover, was he afraid to point the finger of derision at it. Yet now that we think it may solve an ugly problem for us we loudly demand its application. No wonder that abroad we are judged as hypocrites.

Anglo-Italian friendship will, however, plainly survive, despite the lofty, impossibly remote attitude of our Press and the high doctrines of Rome. There are, let it at once be admitted, people in both Britain and Italy who would be undismayed at a complete rupture of cordial relations—for each thinks the friendship of the other unreliable and unworthy—but these are probably of little account. Friendships between nations do not, as those who would at this juncture seek to impose our British psychology on the rest of the world, rest on similarity of character or of conduct—hence the ludicrousness and the certainty of failure of the attempt to make Signor Mussolini act as, say, Lord Curzon would act—but, apart from the obvious and easily discernible bond of common interest, on common lines of culture and of feeling. No politicians can destroy the essential ties between Italy and Britain, just as neither politicians nor commercial men could forge real ties between Italy and Germany.

It would, therefore, be a quite genuine shock to the average Briton to find himself deprived, owing to the conduct of our League of Nations lovers, of the friendship of Italy, especially were he at the same time to find himself possessed of no compensating friendship., But at the moment it looks as though he will make no such discovery. The line of our action in regard to Corfu happily proved of more avail than our recent line of action in regard to the Ruhr, but few Continentals—unless one except the Germans—care greatly what we do. For the immediate future of Europe—and a little longer time than that—lies with the French, and if Paris backs Rome the rest of the world may do as it likes.

The Role of England.

Thoughtful men, the ordinary man, and even Mr. Lloyd George, are getting concerned about the rôle that England is to play in the world's affairs. It is exasperating, it is enervating, and it is shameful to witness her present impotence. What, then, everyone is asking, is to be done about it? Here is France, getting stronger and stronger every day, her plans maturing, her dependence on us hourly decreasing; and here is Europe, in present disorder, but destined to be ruled by a Franco-Polish-cum-Germanic-Russian-cum-Latin bloc, with ourselves dismally out in the cold. An economic boycott of Italy might bring her (so it is argued) to her senses (by which we mean our way of thinking), but what of the consequent decrease in our own trade and employment? On all sides you may hear complaints of our sorry domestic state coupled with complaints of the fall of our prestige abroad.

That is one side, the material side, of the problem. On the other you get people stressing the moral aspect. What, they say, is to become of the world unless there is some fundamental set of principles in it? If you let each nation be a law unto itself, anarchy is the inevitable result, and so on, and so forth. These are the people who wish, whatever becomes of Italy, to see the League emerge triumphant in the present affair. But the trouble may well be that, in an agnostic world, no "principles" are of the slightest use; they are applied when convenient only. It is well known, moreover, and especially to France and to Italy, that all the forces behind the League are not of the highest moral character.

How is England, then, whose political principles are the highest in the world, to escape the charge of hypocrisy on the one hand and of impotence on the other? To this question there can be no answer until we are again as united as we were in 1914. Meanwhile we continue to endure both charges.

Pay of the Services.

The report of the Committee on Pay of State Servants was issued last week, and it is rousing very furious controversy. Those who approve of things being done "in the spirit of the age" will probably approve its recommendations, which are decreases in the rate of Army and of Navy pay, and longer hours for Civil Servants. On the question of the fighting Services it is rather impertinent for a layman to comment, though one can reasonably doubt whether it is a good thing, from the point of view of efficiency, that our future officers should be drawn solely from the moneyed classes. The necessity for private incomes in the past was no evil, but—our moneyed classes are not now what they were!

The Civil Service will, I expect, find few outside its own ranks to plead its cause. For the community, generally speaking, is not fond of Civil Servants; their hours are short and their holidays long—neither of which blessings fall to the lot of the ordinary man. To impose an eight-hour day on them will, therefore, appear no hardship in the eyes of the outer, and, doubtless, unsympathetic world.

The Trade Union Congress.

I have read no impartial account of what the Trade Unions did at their Congress at Plymouth, so that my impressions are the same as of the typical ignoramus—that is, I know that several members quarrelled with each other (just as they do and possibly as sincerely as they do in Parliament), that certain of them took the opportunity to denounce Signor Mussolini, and that the Daily Herald was voted a respite of three months. All of which amounts to very little, and will be forgotten when it is seen that the Italian Premier is as securely in the saddle as ever and when December is finished!

The New Tivoli.

If there is anything at once more typical and more revolting in our civilisation than pretentious, theatre-like "picture-palaces," I am very happy to boast my ignorance of it. And the trouble is that the picture-house is still a paying proposition. Our latest addition is in the Strand, the new Tivoli, which was opened the other day as if it marked an epoch in the history of our Empire, with, I believe, an organ playing, Mme. Kirkby Lunn singing the National Anthem, and so on. All this slush is American, but it seems that the theatre itself is an American idea, for it is to be worked on the "key-theatre" system. Metro pictures are to be shown at this theatre before any other screen gets them. What a horrible person the first-night film-goer will be!

The West Indies.

The West Indian cricket team made the jolliest impression here. Not only did their cricket improve enormously as the rays of our churly sun grew stronger, but they themselves grew in favour with our English crowds. Several of the counties they beat squarely, and they finished up by giving a representative English team a rare fright by getting in the second innings six very good wickets down for less than thirty runs! This feat was entirely due to first-class fast bowling—which our batsmen have never played with confidence since the War—and to excellent fielding. Probably it was the Indians' fielding that more than anything else endeared them to English crowds; it was so alertly and so happily performed.

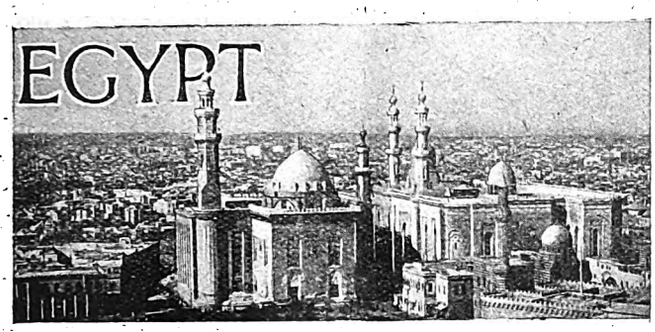
From Our Own Correspondents.



Cairo, August 30.

The Return of Zaghloul Pasha.

Saad Pasha Zaghloul has cabled to the Wafd that he will sail from Marseilles to Alexandria on September 12, arriving at the latter port on the 16th, "to resume his duty towards his country and his King." Hitherto the "venerable leader" and his followers have not been over meticulous about their loyal obligations, Zaghloul Pasha having repeatedly and pointedly neglected to sign his name in the Palace visitors' book; but now all that is to be changed. The Zaghloulists are to be the ultra-constitutional and the most devotedly loyal of parties combined in one. It is devoutly to be hoped that they will find no difficulty in reconciling the two rôles.

Already the native Press is agog with excitement over the homecoming of the national idol. A representative of the Wafd has been delegated to interview the Prime Minister to ascertain what will be permitted in the way of a welcome. It is not anticipated that there will be any serious official restrictions on any programme which the Wafd may draw up. Such action by the Government would not only be very unpopular, but also, so far as can be foreseen, unnecessary. When Zaghloul Pasha returned to the country after two years' absence in the spring of 1921, a time when political feeling was far more intense than now, no check was placed on the rejoicings of his admirers. There were wonderful demonstrations of affection in Alexandria and Cairo, but no disorders. Indeed, the day's toll of crime was far below the average of a normal twenty-four hours. Even the pick-pockets sought, by taking a holiday, to prove that they were not insensible to patriotic feelings.

If a peaceful return was possible two years ago, it should be far more so now. There is, after all, nobody who is likely to try to stir up trouble. Zaghloul Pasha has plenty of opponents, but they are not the kind of antagonists to adopt stone-throwing or head-breaking tactics to prove their opposition. The difficult period will not be the day the Pasha sets foot once more on Egyptian territory, nor even the period immediately succeeding his landing. It will be when he has had time to recover from the fatigues of travel, to take stock of the situation, and to forge his thunderbolts, that the authorities entrusted with the preservation of public order will have to look out for storm signals. It is to be hoped that, even then, apprehensions of what may happen will prove to have been ill-founded. Zaghloul Pasha comes home to a great opportunity to show that those who have called him stubborn, unpractical, intolerant of opposition, are wrong, and that he can respond to the need for a statesman.

Disquiet Among the Officials.

I referred in a previous letter to the uneasiness manifesting itself among certain classes of Government officials. This feeling has been in nowise abated by happenings during the past few weeks. Hitherto, the services of pensionable officials have not usually been dispensed with excepting on account of the suppression of their posts. There have been, of course, dismissals of officials for misconduct or inefficiency, but, provided that a Government servant carried out his duties efficiently and conscientiously, he could rest assured that he would be continued in the service until, in the normal course of events, he attained the age-limit and could retire to enjoy his pension. Such a sense of security is an obvious essential to the piece of mind of the official and, consequently, to the proper carrying on of the country's affairs. If a State servant does not know from day to day whether he is going to be dismissed, he cannot devote to his work the undivided attention which the country has the right to demand. Unfortunately, recent decisions of the Council of Ministers have resulted in creating just such a condition of uncertainty in the minds of a very large number of officials.

About a month ago the Council of Ministers, without any warning whatever, decided to place on pension two officials who, although they had both served over thirty years, had still some years to go to reach the age limit. This was done without any warning whatever, and the first thing the officials themselves knew of the matter was when they read the Council's decisions in the newspapers. Curiously enough, these two Government servants were both Syrian Christians, and, equally curiously, the English head of their department was at home on leave. At the last sitting of the Council of Ministers two more officials, both occupying important positions, and both, so far as their ability to serve the Government was concerned, in the best years of their lives, were similarly treated. Again, curiously enough, both were Christians—one a Syrian and the other a Copt.

In view of these happenings it is little wonder that the officials who are not Egyptian Moslems feel that their positions are insecure. But the feeling is not confined to Christians not of local birth. Moslem officials, too, are disquieted. Wherever one goes nowadays into the company of Government officials one hears the same story, "We don't know what is going to happen to us." Almost every third official seems to be holding a post temporarily, not receiving the pay of the work he is doing, not knowing whether he is to be confirmed in his position or not, and, generally, worried to death about his prospects. British officials are constantly being approached by their Egyptian subordinates with requests for support in getting individual problems settled, but, though the popular belief in British fairness and even omnipotence which the past forty years has built up is still strong, the British officials in the Government are now, for the most part, powerless to do anything for anybody. Their chief concern, naturally enough, is for their own uncertain futures.

The Ramleh Tragedy.

The tragic death of Princess Abbas Halim at Ramleh last Friday gave rise to the inevitable crop of rumours and wild stories, all of which have been proved to be baseless. There seems to be no doubt whatever that the unfortunate lady's death was purely accidental. No reason whatever has been put forward for any contrary supposition. She and her husband, a charming young man of European tastes, were a devoted couple, and to all appearances lived in perfect happiness. But, coming hard on the heels of the shooting of Aly Bey Fahmy in London, a full crop of sensational stories regarding the latest tragedy was, perhaps, inevitable.

Jerusalem, August 27.

The Palestine Development Council.

As elsewhere, so also in Palestine, August seems to be an uneventful month. Perhaps the most outstanding event here has been the visit of Judge Julian Mack, a distinguished American Zionist leader, and one of the organisers of the "Palestine Development Council," popularly known as the "Mack-Brandeis Group." He and his fellow-American Zionists seek to put Palestine Jewry on a stronger basis by "business methods," in place of the prevalent methods, in accordance with which the Jews of Palestine live under a more or less —and rather less than more—disguised Charity Organisation Society system, which—human nature being what it is—has failed to get the last ounce of effort out of the Palestine Jew; for the latter could always know that subsidies would be forthcoming to make good his deficiencies. The "Palestine Development Council" seeks to raise money abroad, and mainly in America, to be invested in various ways in Palestine—banks, loans, buildings, and the like—capable of producing an 8 per cent. return, both justifying the investor and enabling and compelling industry from the beneficiaries.

The Orientation of Zionism.

The outcome of the recently concluded Thirteenth Zionist Congress at Carlsbad will serve to strengthen the hands of the "Mack-Brandeis Group" and bring them into the full stream of Zionist activities. It will be remembered that more than a year ago they broke away from the "Eastern," i.e., East European Zionists, on this same question, viz., the control of the funds that were being raised; the American Zionists favoured investment rather than charity, and argued that carefully organised and supervised expenditure was of more lasting value to the cause than spasmodic appeals to the generosity of the wealthier sections of Jewry. If the Zionist movement was not to die of starvation, there was never much doubt as to the outcome of the division of opinion. Dr. Weizmann and Mr. Sokolow, as practical politicians, had already consented to the reduced political terms offered by the Colonial Office's interpretation of the Balfour declaration, and now they have accomplished the more difficult and delicate task of shifting the centre of gravity of internal Zionist politics from East to West, from Russian idealism which first set the movement alight, to Western and American practical methods which, as the Zionist leaders seem now to have assured themselves, is the only way to ensure the movement's present and future.

Mr. Ussishkin.

This change of policy involves a change of personnel. So far as Palestine is concerned, the chief interest is shown in the fact that the rule of Mr. Ussishkin, since 1919 the strongest item in the local Zionist Executive, now comes to an end. He is a man of remarkable influence and force of character, as is clearly shown by the intense admiration and equally intense detestation which he has extorted from local Jews. For good or for evil his will and policy have dominated conditions here; the manner of man he is is well described in Mr. Philip Graves' "The Land of Three Faiths." He is blamed for the unsympathetic relations which have, at one time or another, existed between the Zionist Executive and the British Administration; whether he can fairly be held accountable for the bad relations between the Jews and Arabs is more doubtful. He is known to the Jews as "the man of iron," and though inflexibility of purpose and single-mindedness may sometimes be admirable traits of character, they have their drawbacks when, as is inevitable for a Russian assuming responsibility in an eastern cauldron like Palestine, the necessity arises for adapting himself to new conditions. He has, to say the least, failed to follow that excellent advice "to be soople in things immaterial"; here it may be important what you do, but it is infinitely more important how you do it; and where Zionist activity has most certainly mis-manœuvred in Palestine is its intentional or unintentional, but anyhow incomprehensible, failure to make use of the experience of oriental Jews, or Jews who have had a lifelong experience of Arabs and Arab mentality. Only less fatal has been the Zionist error of failing to utilise locally Jews with some experience of the mentality of British officialdom. It may be hoped that both errors can now be rectified, though in the first case it is impossible to recover all the ground lost.

King Hussein

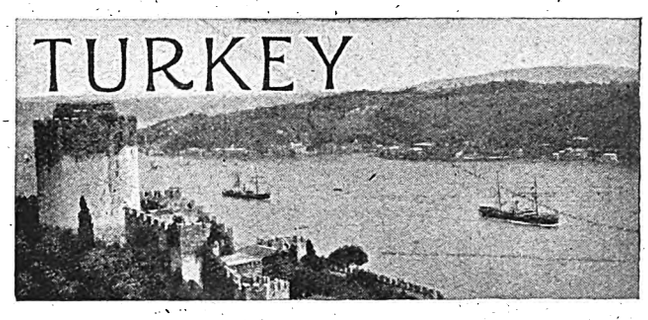
We have just had a milder repetition of King Hussein's ill-timed efforts of three months ago to encourage Palestinian Arab ambitions. At the beginning of last week a Palestinian Delegation returned from Mecca where they had gone for the main purpose of raising interest and funds for repairing the Moslem shrines in Jerusalem. King Hussein sent back with them, as his representative, Sayyid Abbas el-Malki, to assure Palestinian Arabs of his interest in them and their needs. Last Wednesday this representative was given a reception by the Moslem-Christian Association, to which Arab notables from all parts were invited. Sayyid Abbas' intentions may have been primarily to voice King Hussein's interest in the repairs of the Haram, but the local Arabs have shown most interest in his remarks about the draft Anglo-Arab Treaty. King Hussein was made to say that he would refuse to sign the treaty unless it made Palestine entirely independent and a party in the Pan-Arab Confederation that is to be.

The Moslem University.

The Moslem Supreme Council announces that the Moslem University in Jerusalem will be opened this year on October 5. It is to be of precisely the same scope as el-Azhar in Cairo, i.e., it will not be a University in the modern Western sense, but one where the primary subject of study is Mohammedan religious law and Koranic commentaries, and the principal purpose the equipping of Mohammedan lawyers and learned sheikhs. At the same time we hear of another "university" to be opened this year; but, like most things Palestinian, it will be an object more of faith than of fact. In this case the project comes from the Latin Patriarch. The "university" is to have four faculties—Medicine, Engineering, Law, and Letters. The director is to be an Arab, and none but Palestinian-born Arabs will be admitted. The main languages employed will be English and Arabic, but Italian and French will not be excluded. A preparatory division will be opened shortly, containing three classes for the teaching of elementary subjects. Thus, in spite of the name, this "university" is no more than a secondary school, run under Latin auspices and of uncertain standards, and called a "university" to deceive the simple Palestinian.

Hostel Accommodation.

Certain prospective English tourists to Palestine may find it useful to know that the authorities of the English Cathedral in Jerusalem are arranging hostel accommodation for English people who prefer to avoid the uncertainties of hotel life. The venture is beginning on a small scale, but if necessary more elaborate measures will be taken.



Constantinople, September 4.

Farewell Functions.

The evacuation of the British forces is proceeding apace, and ceremonies of adieu are taking place. A notable function was the garden party given by General and Lady Harington at Therapia on August 29, to which were invited numerous representatives of the naval and military forces of the Allies, of the Allied civil colonies, and prominent Turkish official and social personages. Nearly 500 guests had a delightful afternoon on the terrace and in the grounds of the Summer Palace, where tea was served and dancing took place after tea. The function served to illustrate very clearly the affection and respect with which our hosts are regarded by every one in Constantinople irrespective of race and political predilection. We are likely to have an orgy of similar functions in the near future, for the British colony is preparing for a farewell garden party to the British Army, and the Turkish authorities are reported to be going to reciprocate General Harington's hospitality.

General Harington's Review.

Last week General Harington broke the rule he has observed for a year, and granted an interview at G.H.Q. to a representative gathering of local journalists. At that interview he gave his hearers a succinct review of the scope and aims of his task in Constantinople, and of the spirit in which he had endeavoured to carry it out. He laid emphasis on the fact that his task was a military one, both in Constantinople and at the Mudania Conference, and that the Allied military authorities had to follow the instructions of their respective Governments, but that he had consistently endeavoured to maintain strict neutrality against all assaults or attempted assaults on the status quo at Constantinople. The task of maintaining order in Constantinople in the explosive circumstances had not been an easy one, and perhaps, he said, it could have been easier if he had been ruthless and cruel; but he claimed, and no one will dispute that claim without laying himself open to the charge of blind bias, that he had tried to be fair and just towards every one, and to respect the feelings of the Turks. He shortly alluded to the work that had been done towards alleviating the sufferings of the successive convoys of refugees, and to the attempts made to improve the material conditions in the city and its surroundings, the work of the Sanitary Commission, the improvement of the roads, the unremitting and capable efforts of the military fire brigade, and so on.

The Question of Fires.

Full subscription may be made to all that he said. His remarks concerning the fire brigade were particularly pertinent in that on the previous Sunday a disastrous fire, which wiped out the village of Sariyar, on the Bosphorus, and threatened the adjoining village of Buyuk Dere, was arrested entirely by the efforts of the British brigade. As it was, about 600 houses were destroyed and 1,500 people rendered homeless. This question of fire-fighting organisations and appliances is the burning question of the hour, and various schemes are afoot for increasing their efficiency. As long as great areas are covered with wooden houses, fires are bound to be frequent owing to the elementary heating, lighting, and cooking arrangements. The insurance of such house property is almost impossible in any circumstances, but when it is a matter of common knowledge that practically the only appliances available are small hand-pumps, which might, à la rigueur, be of some use for watering the garden, it is obvious that such property is absolutely uninsurable. The Turkish Press, à propos of the recent fire, has shown itself somewhat restive at the sight of the complete inefficiency of its fire brigade, and is strenuously propaganding for the purchase of modern engines and so forth, but, having often seen the brigade at work, one is convinced that the trouble is not with the appliances, but with the personnel, who have not the faintest idea of how to utilise what they have or to tackle a fire in a workmanlike fashion. The authorities should either put their fire brigade through an apprenticeship under the direction of foreign experts, or if that is too damaging for their pride, they should send some of their own people abroad for a course of instruction.

The Post Offices.

Among the other consequences of the Treaty of Lausanne is the abolition of the foreign post offices on Turkish territory. The British Post Office here is closing on September 27, and on and after September 25 all postal material received from the United Kingdom will be handed to the Turkish Post Office for delivery. It is stated that the Turkish Post Office has already engaged a considerable amount of extra staff to deal with the increased work. Until the present time the manner in which the Turkish post has dealt with the foreign mail has been most satisfactory; their weakness has been the local distribution. If they can organise a really rapid and frequent delivery of letters throughout the Constantinople area, they stand a good chance of benefiting the exchequer to an appreciable extent. At present every business house employs the costly and cumbersome method of distributing its local letters by hand; but they would all give up that method at once if they could be provided with the postal facilities enjoyed by any town of over 50,000 inhabitants in Western Europe.

The Bourse at Constantinople.

The Council of Commissaries has just published comprehensive rules for the Constantinople bourse, which are obviously inspired by those in force on the Paris bourse. The number of agents de change is limited for the present to sixty, and they must be of Turkish nationality. They and the brokers and jobbers will all be specially registered and pay in a cautionary deposit to the State. They are forbidden to carry out any operations for their own account, but are to act solely as intermediaries, who must be ready to give the name of the client for whom they are carrying out any operation. A number of detailed regulations are published whose object is to ensure that the principle of strict control against speculation is carried into practice. The idea is undoubtedly sound; but we hope that the Turkish authorities will not persist in their mistaken theory that every downward movement of the Turkish currency is due to the machinations of the small bunch of financial manipulators on the Galata bourse. The cry of speculation is raised at once when the lira goes down 20 points, and people appear to assume that once you restrict the activities of these gentry there will be a marvellous recovery of Turkish credit. The sooner they disabuse their minds of this idea and concentrate upon effective measures for increasing the productivity, and, consequently, the exports of the country, the sooner the Turkish lira will appreciate. The Press is already alive to the seriousness of the expert labour question, and is beginning to imply more or less openly that the recent policy of the expulsion of allogeneous elements has been a serious mistake, which will have to be rectified.

Exchanges of Populations.

The practical measures to give effect to the exchange of populations agreement do not seem to be moving very fast. The Turkish Government is reported to be trying to find the funds by the sale of abandoned properties; but it is realised that that amount will not go very far towards it. Another proposal that is being ventilated is that a land bank with a capital of 15 to 20 million Turkish pounds should be founded to finance the operations. The only comment on this is that if they wait for the fruition of such a scheme the exchange will never take place. In any case, every one seems to have decided that very little exchanging can be done this year, although the Greek Government is supposed to be taking active measures to get rid of the exchangeable elements. All one can say is that the longer the exchange is put off the better for the wretched people who come under the provisions of the agreement.

YUGOSLAVIA.

Liubliana, September 6.

Birth of the Heir Apparent.

At this moment of writing the castle guns are booming out the glad news of the birth of an heir to the Crown. A few days ago it appeared likely that the royal baby would be born a Carniolian highlander at the King's summer residence in Bled. But at the last moment their Majesties decided to return to Belgrade, which has, after all, an indisputable claim to the honour of being the birthplace of the first heir to the crown of Yugoslavia—the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes.

The Græco-Italian Incident.

As the Adriatic problem is profoundly affected by the Fiume question, Yugoslavia, as a whole, is not disinclined to take sides against Italy in the present difficulty between her and Greece. But it is equally out of the question that she should take sides for Greece. Her experiences during the War, the unsettled question of the Yugoslav zone in Salonika, the harsh treatment accorded to the Serb national minority of 400,000 souls in Greece, and, finally, the prevailing poor opinion of the Greek Army—all these are reasons urging Yugoslavia to observe an attitude of strict neutrality in the conflict.

The Internal Situation.

The Communal Elections in Serbia and Montenegro have resulted in a complete victory of the Radical party. The all-Radical Government has been justified by them. With these Communal Elections the struggle between Radicals and Democrats has entered upon its decisive phase, and it is safe to say that the final victory will be for the Radicals. The Democrat party is going downhill; its heirs are the Radicals and the Agrarian Party, which quintupled the number of its communes in these elections. But whether the strength of the Agrarian Party will suffice for it to challenge the power of the Radicals is still uncertain, as the party has grown from the peasant class and lacks intellectual leadership.

The immediate consequence of the Communal Elections is that the Radicals can now at any moment appeal to the electorate, that they will put through the elections for the district councils, and therewith carry out the most ticklish point in the Constitution.

That they can safely take this daring step is due to M. Raditch, who, by his flight to England, has filled the ranks of the Croatian bloc with confusion. But confusion renders all resistance impossible. This flight has had yet another disastrous consequence for the Federalists. The Slovene Clericals are deserting M. Raditch, and the Spaho group are preparing to do the same.

The Catholic Assembly in Liubliana, which was held in great pomp and graced by the presence of the King, the Government, and the Papal Nuncio, was the overture to this change, and the first stepping-stone for the entry of the Clericals into the Government. There have already been negotiations to this end, and the Radicals have at least scored this much, that they can already use the Clericals to make short work of the stubbornness of the Djemiyet. Truly, the Radicals owe much to the help, intentional and otherwise, of the Opposition Parties!

AMBULANCE WORK IN INDIA.

To the Editor of THE NEAR EAST.

Sir,—You very kindly allowed me to protest in THE NEAR EAST of July 5 against the habit so prevalent in the Press of India of submerging the St. John Ambulance in the Red Cross. You not unjustly denounced my heading as "ungainly" and as affording an excuse for the Press of India's inaccurate brevity, and I therefore now give you a heading against which can be urged neither inaccuracy nor prolixity. Further, I propose to make my letter nearly as brief as my heading.

The point is this. The Order of St. John of Jerusalem began ambulance work in India fifteen years before the Red Cross Society had the smallest footing in that vast and all-important dependency. But for that, when the "Red Cross" went to India for the War, they would have found nothing whatever ready to their hand.

When on July 21, 1910, the late Viscount Knutsford spoke in the House of Lords on "Territorial Force Ambulance," he, in dwelling earnestly on the value of the St. John Ambulance certificate, made the following reference to work in India:—

> "It (i.e., the diminution of the value of the certificate) would be a fatal blow in India, where we have done magnificent work, helped by Lord Curzon, Lord Minto, Lord Kitchener, and, amongst others, by Lieut.-Colonel A. Yate, who did very good service in promoting that work; and also in almost every colony (those with responsible government as well as Crown Colonies), where we have active working centres in close touch with the Ambulance Department here."—"Parliamentary Debates, House of Lords," Vol. VI., No. 45, col. 386.)

Were the words of Lord Knutsford more valid in 1910 than they are to-day? Is the value of the St. John Ambulance certificate less to-day than in 1910? Are the St. John Ambulance centres in India and the Colonies less flourishing to-day than in 1910? Did Lords Curzon, Minto, and Kitchener take up the St. John Ambulance work in 1905 with the idea that later on the "Red Cross" would engulf it? When our present King visited India in 1905-06 as Prince of Wales, Lord Kitchener, in a memorandum drawn up by himself, Sir Denzil Ibbetson, and Dr. Lefroy, Bishop of Lahore, invited His Royal Highness to show the interest he took in the St. John Ambulance Association. His Royal Highness did so on two occasions.

The whole nation and Empire is well aware that not only our Royal Family, but all grades of British society, are heart and soul behind the work both of the St. John Ambulance and of the Red Cross, and there is not the smallest reason why the two should not work side by side, but independently, for the general weal. New men arise and prate of amalgamation. Nothing is to be gained by amalgamation. Rather the reverse. Sixty years bear witness to the good work of "St. John," and it is distinctly for the public benefit, in peace and in war, that that good work should continue under, and solely under, the Order of St. John of Jerusalem.—I am, etc.,

A. C. YATE, Lieut.-Colonel,
Hon. Organising Commissioner of the St. J.A.A. in India from 1900 to 1910.

EGYPT AND THE SUDAN.

The Sphinx, of Cairo, has just published an entertaining special tourist number, entitled "Egypt and the Sudan." In it is mentioned practically everything that is likely to interest the visitor to Egypt or the Sudan—specific things such as historical buildings, excavations, and sport, or such "atmospheric" affairs as the charm of Egypt's society, her colour, her health and pleasure giving properties, and so on. The volume is admirably produced, with many extremely fine photographs, and is, in short, a very effective piece of propaganda.

Professor MacAlister, Director of the Palestine Exploration Society's intended excavations on the Mount of Olives, arrived in Jerusalem last week.

The first batch of troops to return from the Near East reached Southampton last Thursday in the transport Somali, and were accorded a civic reception by the Mayor and Corporation. They included the 2nd Battalion East Yorkshire Regiment and detachments of Artillery and Engineers.

THE TWO CRIMES.

Italy during the past week has provided the spectacle of a country wholly given up to a deliberate misunderstanding of a straightforward issue. Two crimes have been committed, both meriting and receiving the severest condemnation. They are, however, distinct, and by no manner of sophistry can they be connected in such a way that the first shall be held to justify the second. In no responsible quarter has any attempt been made to condone or to extenuate the Janina crime or to challenge Italy's right to full reparation. The matter might well have been and ought to have been settled by Italy and Greece without recourse to the League of Nations, although Italy's ultimatum made such a solution practically impossible. Before there was time for any settlement to be reached, however, Italy herself committed the second crime, the occupation and bombardment of Corfu, an offence not so much against Greece as against the League of Nations, to whose Covenant she was a signatory. In Article X. of that Covenant she had pledged herself "to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the League." Article XV. adds: "If there should arise between members of the League any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with Article XIII., the members of the League agree that they will submit the matter to the Council." In the face of these pledges it is impossible for Italy to contend with any show of reason that the occupation of Corfu was not a violation of the Covenant and of the Treaty of Versailles of which it forms part. Nor is there any clause in the Covenant which removes from the jurisdiction of the League questions of so-called national honour. The Janina crime, if it could not be settled by the diplomacy of the countries immediately concerned, was particularly one that in regard to which the possibly slow working of the League machinery would have entailed no prejudice to Italy. The victims were beyond the reach of help; Greece, on whose soil the outrage had been committed, could not evade her measure of responsibility, and, in actual fact, made no attempt to evade it; there remained, therefore, the nice adjustment of the penalty to the crime. In such circumstances what possible justification could there be for the crime of Corfu, with its deliberate offence against all the co-signatories of the Covenant of the League of Nations?

The Italian Government affects to find in the emphasis laid upon the Corfu outrage "a bold attempt to transpose the terms of the question." It ignores the fact that of the two crimes one, as far as Europe was concerned, was immediately, to all intents and purposes, relegated into the limbo of the past by Greece's undertaking to make full reparation. Whether in acknowledgment of her responsibility Greece performs one act of reparation or another, or whether she pays Italy ten million or fifty million lire, is a matter of indifference to Europe. If, on the other hand, it should be established that the assassins were Albanians, interest would centre mainly in the effect of the discovery on the Italian Government. The second crime, however, that of Corfu, remained; not only did Italy make no sign of evacuating the island when it was apparent that Greece would not refuse to give satisfaction, but she refused also to admit guilt in regard to the murder of civilians by an unprovoked bombardment. In the matter of the original issue between Italy and Greece arising out of the Janina murders the special conditions could be made to justify reference to the Conference of Ambassadors, on whose behalf the Italian military mission was acting when it was murdered on Greek territory; but there could be no delegation of authority in upholding the sanctity of the Covenant, although in all the circumstances it will be politic, in the interests of an early return to normalcy, to accept on this point also the Ambassadors' settlement which provides for the evacuation of Corfu. Italy, we may hope, as soon as her people have recovered from the first outburst of natural indignation over the murders, will realise the logic of the stand made in Great Britain and other countries on behalf of the League, and will begin to appreciate the falseness of the position into which she was forced by the Government's action. Signor Salandra's defence before the Council of the League of Nations at Geneva was as illogical as that action had been intemperate. The sanctity of human life is no greater in a motor car than it is in an obsolete fort; and international law is as forcibly violated by the unprovoked fire of ships' guns as by the discharge of bandits' rifles.

If Italy's intentions are peaceful, the whole sorry episode can be quickly liquidated. The Conference of Ambassadors has dealt with the question of Greek responsibility for the Janina murders; it has fixed the method and measure of Greek reparation, and places on record the statement of the Italian Government that in occupying Corfu it had no other object than to obtain satisfaction for the demand that it had made to Greece. This declaration implies that Corfu is to be evacuated as soon as Greece has complied with the demands now put forward by the Conference of Ambassadors. If Signor Mussolini has any greatness in him and is possessed of statesmanship, he will in this instance see that Italy is better than her implied pledge, and he will lose no time in withdrawing the Italian troops from Corfu. All the circumstances of the Italian case against Greece and the attitude of the latter from the outset prove that the occupation was unnecessary. The unfortunate blunder of the bombardment put Italy still further in the wrong, and some whole-hearted gesture on her part is called for if Italian prestige is to be restored. The Italian Government has been guilty of a grave lapse in its breach of the Covenant of the League of Nations, and if it were to do anything now to aggravate its offence it would inevitably stir up against Italy a measure of hostility that would far outweigh any temporary advantage in the Adriatic at Greece's expense. Signor Mussolini affects to be disillusioned over the genuineness of British friendship for Italy by reason of the criticism to which the Italian action has been subjected. A friendship in which there is no scope for the exchange of honest opinion on both sides can hardly be worth having. British public opinion has regarded Italy and her Government as being on a level, morally and intellectually, with itself, and has not hesitated to judge Italian action by its own standards. We cannot believe that Signor Mussolini would seriously wish to be regarded or treated with the tolerant contempt that might be accorded to the head of a petty and backward State, for whose acts some allowance must be made.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE SUDAN.

From the recently published "Report on the Finances, Administration, and Condition of the Sudan in 1922" we extract the chapters upon "Administrative Policy" and "Frontiers."—ED.

ADMINISTRATIVE POLICY.

In giving some general indications of our policy of administrative development, last year's report stated that "our object, briefly, was to leave administration as far as possible in the hands of native authorities wherever they exist, under the supervision of the Government, starting from things as it finds them, putting its veto on what is dangerous and unjust, and supporting what is fair and equitable in the usage of the natives."

An interesting experiment on these lines is being carried out in the administration of Dar Masalit in Western Darfur, which by the ratification of the Convention of 1919 between the United Kingdom and France was finally included within the boundaries of the Sudan. Occupation of the country was gradual, with a view to establishing confidence in the new régime. A member of the Political Service was appointed Resident, and installed with a small garrison at Kereinik, on the eastern border of the Dar; later, when the local Sultan and his notables had become accustomed to our presence within his boundaries, and had had sufficient opportunity to gauge the purpose and method of our administration, a move was made to the capital Geneina.

The existing system was carefully investigated. It consisted of a supreme authority in the person of a Sultan, who ruled the country both through agents appointed personally by himself, and also through an organisation originally tribal but tending through the movement of individual families to become territorial in character. This organisation consisted of heads of sections ("farash," singular "firsha"), and heads of sub-sections ("dimâlig," singular "dimlig"), the latter being the smallest administrative unit, and controlling as many as six villages. Personal agents of the Sultan, both executive and judicial, acted independently of local chiefs, and, as might be expected, this dual system of control led to considerable confusion and irregularity both in the collection of taxes and in the administration of justice. The powers and jurisdiction of the various authorities were vague and ill-defined, with the result that the well-being of the people depended to a large extent on the character of the Sultan, who, in the present instance, though highly intelligent, is weak and irresolute.

Dar Masalit, therefore, provided virgin ground for the trial of a policy of retaining, so far as is consistent with the removal of abuses and the maintenance of a reasonable standard of efficiency, the existing administrative machinery and method. In pursuance of this policy a regular assessment of the grain crop of 1921-22 by native boards was carried out with a view to putting the collection of the grain tax on a systematic basis. This method of assessment is in common use in agricultural provinces of the Sudan. In all there were twelve boards, each consisting of two notables and a clerk. The notables were selected, in consultation with the Sultan, on the criteria of good character and intelligence only. Some were "farash," others were agents of the Sultan, and others notables holding no office, and, to inspire confidence, boards containing a "firsha" assessed the tribal area. Instructions for the boards were issued by the Resident, who, it was intended, should generally supervise the assessment. Owing, however, to the political situation at the time (referred to in my report for 1921), the work of the boards received no supervision whatever. It is therefore all the more interesting to record that, in the opinion of the Resident gained during subsequent tours, the boards as a whole displayed a very high degree of honesty. The tax as assessed has been brought in readily, and the result of this first attempt in Dar Masalit to introduce a regular assessment through native channels is distinctly encouraging.

Further, early this year, with the consent and co-operation of the Sultan, the existing judicial system was modified, defined, and regularised, and, at the same time, provision was included for the exercise of judicial powers by the Resident. Limited jurisdiction and powers of punishment in respect of certain minor offences are laid down for "farash" and "dimâlig"; the jurisdiction and powers of the kadi (the judicial representative of the Sultan) and of the Sultan are also defined. More serious offences are dealt with by minor and major courts constituted by order of the Resident, and consisting of at least three members. Powers of appeal in all cases are amply provided for, and the present system built on the existing judicial framework, appears up to the present to be in practice a successful solution of the difficulty of accommodating native customs and usage to the principles of a stereotyped penal code and procedure. This method of indirect and advisory administration appears so far satisfactory, and its future development in Dar Masalit will be watched with considerable interest.

An application of the same policy is being tried in the Southern Sudan by the establishment of chiefs' courts to deal with local cases of minor importance. In Mongalla Province, for instance, four lukiko, or chiefs' courts, now sit monthly in the Latuka district, and the innovation has proved successful.

Again, in the Upper Nile Province, the internal administration of the Shilluks is being left as much as possible in the hands of tribal chiefs under the supervision of the Mek, the District Commissioner being concerned only in cases of appeal or if he has reason to suspect any abuse of the native authority. The Governor reports that the system has been an unqualified success.

In other provinces the policy of conferring magisterial powers on suitable notables to enable them to sit as members of criminal courts is being steadily carried out. During the year excellent reports of their work have been received, and the appointment is one that is highly prized.

The training of native administrative officials through the Sub-Mamurs Training School at Khartoum shows favourable progress. Hitherto, selected candidates had held previous Government appointments, but it is interesting to note that this year, for the first time, a candidate who had had some experience as an omda was selected, somewhat as an experiment. The progress he achieved suggests the possibility of tapping a new and promising source for recruitment. In contrast to last year, when eleven candidates were finally rejected as unsuitable, only two failed to qualify for appointment to administrative posts.

Reference was made in last year's report to the constitution of a consultative and advisory municipal council for the towns of Khartoum, Khartoum North and Omdurman, among the members of which were natives of the municipal area. This institution has been a success, and the Governor reports that the attendance at all meetings has been good and the interest keen and well maintained. He remarks that, as might be expected, the bulk of discussion and debate is at present carried on by non-native members, but he is confident that with greater experience of the procedure and working of the council the native element will take an increasing share in the discussion of municipal affairs. In general, the lines of administrative policy indicated in my report of last year are being steadily followed and would appear, so far as the experience of this year can show, to be fully justified.

One further point in this connection is worthy of note. The work of native assistant medical officers will be referred to in a later chapter, but the value of medical work to administration is shown by the success which has attended the fitting out of the hospital ship "Lady Baker" on the Upper Nile. The prime factor in successful administration of the backward races in this and other provinces of the Sudan is mutual confidence between Government and governed. The popularity of the visit of this hospital ship to various localities on the Upper Nile and up the Sobat to Gambeila has proved that medical assistance is one of the quickest and surest methods of getting into touch with the local tribes. The late Lord Kitchener on his last visit to Khartoum urged the institution of a school of medicine, and the memorial to be erected to his name is very appropriately taking the form of a medical school. During the War, and for some time after, the cost of all building materials was prohibitive, and no further progress could be made with the scheme beyond selecting a site and drawing up plans. This year, however, a contract for the building was placed in March, and it is expected that it will be completed and equipped by the end of 1923. The experience already gained of the work of assistant medical officers and of the close connection between medical and administrative work indicates that the training of natives in this school will prove a distinct step forward in the administrative development of the country.

FRONTIERS.

Abyssinia.

(a.) Fung Province.—As had been anticipated in last year's report, the Abyssinian Government took further steps against the rebel chief, Fitaurari Mohammed Wad Mahmud. Sheikh Khojali-el-Hassan was despatched from Addis Abeba to secure his arrest, and with the assistance of Dejazmatch Igazu carried out the task successfully. Mohammed Wad Mahmud was sent a prisoner to the capital. A noteworthy commentary on the disturbed conditions previously existing on the Abyssinian side of the boundary is the fact that nearly 600 Abyssinians had emigrated to the Sudan prior to the arrest of Mohammed Wad Mahmud and were settled near Roseires, where they appear to be contented and well-behaved.

(b.). Mongalla Province.—The services of Major E. B. Hawkins, D.S.O., His Majesty's Consul at Maji, were unfortunately not available after May this year, and the appointment has been vacant since that date. Prior to his departure, Major Hawkins was able to effect the recall of Fitaurari Mashesha, the local Governor, who had done everything possible to obstruct any attempt to repress slave raids, elephant poaching, and cattle stealing. The hereditary Governor of the province, Dejazmatch Desta Beru, died in May, and Fitaurari Moukria Gourmami was appointed in his place. As he is reported to be an intelligent official and disposed to be friendly to Europeans, it is hoped that the excellent impression made by Major Hawkins's endeavours will bear fruit. Early in the year Major Hawkins was successful in confiscating a large consignment of ivory at Maji, which is probably used as a base by elephant poachers. There is little doubt that a policy of confiscation of stocks of ivory illegally come by will prove more successful than attempts by patrols to apprehend individual raiding parties in the Sudan. The element of surprise is essential, but almost impossible to attain, and an attempt made in June consequent on the activities of raiders in the Losinga and Lotelepay districts to capture a suspected camp on the River Lokalian bore little result. The presence of a British consul at Maji, or, failing that, the inclusion of Maji in the sphere of a neighbouring consulate, backed by the co-operation of a strong local Governor in pursuing the policy successfully initiated by Major Hawkins, would appear at present to be the only effective method of preventing these raids.

Eritrea.

A redemarcation of that part of the existing boundary lying between Jebel (hill) Dobadab and Jebel Benifier was successfully carried out and mutually agreed to by representatives of both Governments in December.

Uganda.

The operations against the Didinga Hills referred to in last year's report came to a successful conclusion in January, when all Didinga chiefs surrendered. Subsequently a small garrison was left there with Mr. J. H. Driberg, of the Uganda Civil Service, as Political Officer with headquarters at Nagichot. In May Mr. Driberg reported that the general situation was very satisfactory, and that the chiefs on whom he had called for assistance, both in labour and material, had responded with considerable alacrity. Administration proceeded smoothly until September, when a disaffected (and probably mentally deranged) petty chief, Mohamed Apendongimoi, attacked Mr. Driberg's camp, and killed two of his servants. It is significant perhaps of a desire for a more settled existence that this chief and his followers were afterwards captured and handed over to Government troops by friendlies. No other hostile incident has occurred. During the year the Uganda Government, in view of the reduction of their regular military establishment, were compelled to request this Government to assume responsibility for the future administration of the Didinga Hills, and arrangements were made for the transfer of the administration and withdrawal of Uganda troops by the end of the year. The administration of the Didinga involves the administration of the neighbouring and hitherto unadministered tribe of Taposa, who, however, do not appear to resent closer relations with Government. The administration of these tribes marks a distinct advance in the administration of Eastern Mongalla. It is early yet to say whether the effect of the recent operations will be such as to ensure the tranquillity of this hitherto lawless area, but for the moment the preliminary steps towards a permanent administration have been successfully carried out.

Delimitation of boundary (see report for 1921). The respective Commissioners, Lieutenant-Colonel Pearson and Lieutenant-Colonel Grossard, met on the boundary at Tumtuma in January, and drew up a method of survey. While survey operations were in progress, the two Commissioners, with a view to collecting all available information, visited portions of the boundary where difficulties appeared likely to arise. The survey made remarkable progress: by the end of the year the whole of the frontier area from latitude 16 deg. to latitude 11 deg. had been mapped, and it is anticipated that the remainder of the frontier south to its junction with the Belgian Congo will be completed by March next year, nine months earlier than the date originally estimated. Efforts, however, on the part of the Commissioners to arrive at an agreed boundary at all points in accordance with the Convention of 1919 unfortunately proved unavailing. Differences of opinion arose in regard to its interpretation in certain areas, notably in the country lying between parallels 11 deg. and 9 deg., where the British Commissioner claimed that, since the geographical data on which the relevant international agreements had been drawn up had proved to be erroneous, an ethnological division should be followed in accordance with the spirit of the Convention, while the French Commissioner maintained that south of parallel 11 deg. the delimitation should be ruled by more purely geographical considerations. The settlement of this difficulty seemed not impossible. However, in two small sections of the northern section of the boundary the application of the wording of the Convention to local conditions gave rise to widely divergent views, which in spite of prolonged investigations and discussions proved irreconcilable. No other course was open, therefore, except to draw up a protocol setting forth the points of difference and agreement, and to submit individual recommendations for the settlement of those parts of the boundary in dispute. At the end of the year Colonel Pearson was on his way to a conference with Colonel Grossard with a view to effect, if possible, a compromise on the points of issue and, failing agreement, to sign the protocol, when he was unfortunately taken ill and died at Um Dafog on December 28.

PRESS ON THE NEAR EAST.

Italy, the League, and Britain.

The Daily Telegraph of September 10, after stating that the Ambassadors' Note to Greece marks a step towards a settlement of the Italo-Greek dispute, is careful to point out that "it does not by any means end the matter"—

> If the dispute only concerned the murder of General Tellini and his party it would in all probability be closed by the Ambassadors' Note. Unhappily, the occupation of Corfu by Italy and Signor Mussolini's specific refusal to accept the mediation of the League of Nations have given a graver turn to a most distressing episode. It would be unwise to assume, on the information as yet available, that the Ambassadors have solved this far larger problem. They have nothing to say about the League.

And over the evacuation of Corfu, it goes on to remark, nothing quite authoritative has yet been issued. But the question of Corfu must again be raised—

> Doubtless the Conference of Ambassadors, in omitting to refer to the League of Nations, felt that the League was well able to speak for itself. We do not doubt, indeed, that the Corfu question will be raised at Geneva, whether the Italian Government wishes it or not. If the Council of the League were willing to defer the matter, at the instance of the Great Powers, we may be sure that the Assembly, in which any Power, however small, has the right to make its opinions heard, would not consent to ignore the Italian action.

It cannot agree, moreover, that the Italians can conceivably be justified in flouting the League, and still hopes that "Signor Mussolini will not force such an invidious choice upon us or the other Allies"—

> If he will make it clear that the evacuation of Corfu is dependent solely on the fulfilment of the Ambassadors' conditions, and will not be delayed on any other grounds, the chief danger will be dispelled. The debates in the Assembly of the League will then assume a more or less academic character and the affair will pass into relative oblivion. The leaders of opinion in the League will, we feel sure, remember that their first duty is to seek peace and ensue it, not to exalt the League as the only means by which peace can be preserved. The immediate problem is to restore normal relations between Italy and Greece, and if the League can assist better to that end by standing aside than by intervening actively it would be well advised to adopt the humbler part.

The Morning Post of September 10 is concerned to show the part which Great Britain played in bringing about what promises to be a settlement:—

> In those negotiations the British Government have taken and are still taking a prominent part. They will meet, and have indeed already been assailed by, many critics. We strongly deprecate any such attacks on the Government at this moment. On the contrary, we believe that should this dangerous crisis be successfully overcome the country will not forget the part which Mr. Baldwin's administration have played in the matter. The British people are not violently perturbed about the rights of the League of Nations or the fate of the Island of Corfu. What they are anxious about is the maintenance of the peace of the world and the preservation of their historic friendship with Italy. To secure those two great purposes it was necessary that the sanctity of the treaties which enshrine the common victory should be observed, and that a direct clash between Italy and Great Britain should be avoided. What makes atrocious crimes such as that recently committed at Janina so baneful is the difficulties they place in the way of the working of peaceful diplomacy, and if British and Italian statesmen succeed in reaching a settlement without embittering Anglo-Italian relations they will deserve well of the public opinion of both countries.

The Westminster Gazette of September 7 obviously believes that the upholding of the League's authority is worth far more than the mere preservation of an Anglo-Italian alliance :—

> We hope that the withdrawal of Italy would not, in the last resort, be carried out; but we do not agree that her withdrawal would be the end of the League. Indeed, a genuine assertion of the League's authority at a time of crisis like this would, in our opinion, do far more good than Italy's temporary defection would do harm. The League ought to be far more inclusive than it is, and we hope it soon will be. But its present members, even without Italy, if they really showed themselves determined to stand together and by the Covenant, would be quite strong enough to protect themselves and to preserve the peace. On the other hand, a League that had once shown itself impotent in face of Signor Mussolini's blank denial of its authority would be useless except as a clearing-house for unimportant international business. The League, if it is anything, is an association of nations who really desire the preservation of peace and are prepared to co-operate to that end. The discussions of the last few days have at least shown how widespread is the anxiety that there should be a strong instrument of that kind, and which nations can be relied upon to support it. Whatever the outcome, this clearing of the air cannot be harmful, and it may be very useful.

The New Age of September 6 has an ingenious explanation of Signor Mussolini's dramatic gestures. Once more economics underlie politics :—

> Italy owes Great Britain £528,000,000. Assuming her intention to pay any part of this sum, she will have to earn it in the world market. So it is her duty to take precautions against "economic strangulation." Now, the traffic from Central Europe has the choice of three routes to the Mediterranean for the Levant and the Orient via Port Said. One of these routes is through Italy to Brindisi. Another is through Bulgaria and Turkey to Constantinople. But the shortest (in respect of sea passage) is through Serbia and Greece to Salonika. It is true that the Greek railways are in a poor condition and the trains too slow; but all that is soon remedied—it is a matter of finance. Accordingly, negotiations have been proceeding between the Greek Government and various English, French, and American capitalists for the transference or leasing of these lines, so that the Salonika-Ghevgeli railway in particular may be improved to permit of greater train speed. There is also a scheme to encourage Greek shipowners to make their service from Salonika to Port Said superior to that of the Italian fleet from Brindisi. It is hoped thus to divert the greater part of the Central European traffic with the Orient from Brindisi or from the projected ports on the Albanian coast. Now here is a threat to Italy's economic interests that will not yield to purgatives, not even if the financiers who launched Signor Mussolini on his dramatic career were to corner the world's output of croton oil. There are two alternatives open to the Prime Minister; either to create a military diversion and delay the Greek development scheme, or to discover some way of securing his country's participation with Greece in the benefits to be derived from it. Some person or persons unknown, by killing General Tellini and his colleagues on the Frontier Delimitation Commission, have provided Signor Mussolini with the excuse for adopting the first of these alternatives, and he has given a wrench to the tense nerves of European diplomacy by occupying Corfu and setting a time limit for the final settlement of the future of Fiume—and all so promptly that the world might almost believe that the massacre of the innocent commissioners had been previously revealed to him in a dream. For ourselves, we can only hope that the private gentlemen whose financial commitments and expectations on both sides are involved will continue to talk to each other in as friendly and discreet a manner as possible with the view of arriving at a settlement which the League of Nations may afterwards announce as its own judgment. Thus, for the ways of God are inscrutable, His servant General Tellini will not have died in vain, and his sorrowing family may yet live to see inscribed on his tombstone the great thing he bought with his blood—the Articles of Association of the Italio-Greek Railway Corporation, 1924, Ltd.

NOTES AND NEWS.

Adriatic Crises.

The Græco-Italian crisis could not leave the financial world entirely unconcerned, but its effect on markets has not been serious. A week ago any prospect of war was already discounted, and now the certainty of a quick settlement has been established sooner than was expected. In saying this one has to take for granted that, both Italy and Greece having accepted the terms propounded by the Conference of Ambassadors, the former will honourably evacuate Corfu at an early date. It is not quite so easy to be optimistic over the threatened Fiume crisis, if there is to be one on September 15 when Italy's time-limit for the acceptance by Yugo-Slavia of her settlement of the question expires. There have been a good many alarms and excursions over this question in the last three years, and it is to be hoped that peace between the two countries concerned will still be maintained. Italy's action in regard to Corfu, however, has not been lost on the States of South-Eastern Europe. Fortunately, there are many factors working against war. Attention may here be directed to an illuminating article on the Fiume question from our Correspondent in Yugoslavia, which appears on the next page.

Trade With Persia.

Anglophobia is still a factor in the economics as well as in the politics of Persia, and it has found a fresh vent in the boycott of British goods and of trade with Irak in retaliation for the deportation of a Persian priestly agitator from the latter country. The matter, when viewed in its proper perspective, may not be a very serious one; but it is unfortunate at a time when the world is interested in seeing an early return to smoothness of working in trade matters in every direction. Britain's loss in this case is clearly Russia's gain as there has been of late a marked upward movement in Russo-Persian trade. Reports of the Baku Fair state that at the end of June the total turnover was estimated at 2.9 million gold roubles, as compared with a total turnover of 1.3 millions in 1922. The percentage of sales to Persia had risen from 5.4 of all goods sold last year to 23.4 at the end of June. It will be a great triumph for our Minister in Teheran, Sir Percy Loraine, if he is able by the weight of his own personality, to change Anglo-Persian relations in a fairly short time.

The Irak Mail Route.

As was suggested in these notes last week, the despatch of mail matter from Baghdad on August 30 by motor service across the Syrian Desert to Damascus and Haifa proves to have been in the nature of a trial trip. Before that journey the company responsible for the service had made twelve crossings of the desert without encountering any special difficulties and without mishap. On the outgoing trip from Damascus one of the passengers was the Postmaster-General of Irak, who had just completed negotiations with the French authorities in Syria, the Palestine Government, and the Palestine Railways for the transport of the mails. Arrangements, it is understood, are being made to run a train from Haifa on Sunday to connect with the P. and O. steamer leaving Port Said every Monday for Marseilles. By this means Baghdad should be brought into weekly communication with London, the transit occupying nine days. A further mail was expected to be dispatched by motor-car from Baghdad on September 13, but the regular weekly service to Baghdad from Haifa will not start until Thursday, October 11.

The Cotton Trade.

The Lancashire cotton trade has been so badly hit that it is not a matter for surprise that on all sides attempts are being made to discover some means of lifting the industry out of its slough of despond. One of the latest is to form a new central federation, to include all the existing organisations of both employers and operatives, as well as being representative of all the processes, i.e., spinning, weaving, machine-making, printing, dyeing, and finishing. In other words, the new body, if it should be formed, would aim at co-ordinating every interest with a view to bringing the full weight of every section to bear upon the situation. Whether the proposal will materialise remains to be seen, but those behind it are right in the principle underlying the movement—that the industry must leave nothing undone to help itself. The cotton trade to-day is hampered by the price of cotton and working costs; the former is outside its control, the latter is not.

The Crux of "Hours."

The position in the Blackburn cotton industry is said to be worse than in most other areas. That town caters specially for the Indian trade, and at a recent meeting of the Town Council to discuss the holding of a conference on the unemployment question, the position in regard to the Indian market was lucidly explained by one speaker. In 1914, he pointed out, thousands of shirtings were made in Blackburn for sale at 7s. per piece; the price for the same cloth to-day was 15s., an increase of 115 per cent. Another cloth which before the War cost 8s. 9d. was now 19s. 6d., an increase of more than 120 per cent. On the other hand, India was receiving a price for her cereals equivalent to an increase of only 33 per cent., and, consequently, had not the money to buy Lancashire cloth. It is, of course, idle to preach more work on the part of the individual when there is not enough work to go round; but the vicious circle has to be broken somewhere, and the time to do it is when there seems to be a reasonable chance of an improved demand for cotton goods. The breaking of the vicious circle must take the form of the casting for all time on to the scrap-heap of false doctrines the Labour theory that shorter hours for the individual worker provides work for more people. In the long run it has the opposite effect, as it inevitably restricts trade by the addition to working costs. There are many who feel confident that this problem of working costs, unless promptly grappled with, will end in losing the Indian market for British cotton goods.

COMMENTATOR.

THE FIUME QUESTION.

(From Our Correspondent in Yugoslavia.)

A little while ago the Chambers of Commerce and export traders of all Yugoslavia met in conference at Belgrade. At this conference, which was attended by the country's best authorities on trade and industry, it was computed that for the year from September 1, 1923, to August 31, 1924, Yugoslavia has over 6,000 million dinars' worth of goods for export, chiefly agricultural produce, live stock, meat, fruit, timber, coal, eggs, and raw material. The inclusion of wine and spirits in this list would bring the export figure up to something well over 8 milliard dinars. Yet this year's harvest is not specially good, and reconstruction work in Serbia is far from being completed. Hence, in normal times—and Yugoslavia is visibly getting nearer to normal conditions—a far greater export would have to be reckoned with. This is also obvious from the fact that to-day the total export of all Yugoslavia, calculated in gold value, amounts to scarcely one-tenth of what Serbia alone exported before the War. (It must not be forgotten that in those days Serbia enjoyed the right of free export via Salonika, and conditions for export down the Danube were better than they are to-day.)

Yet, with all these goods for export on her hands, Yugoslavia has not one proper harbour. True, Cattaro is one of the best and largest natural harbours in the world. But there is no railway to Cattaro. The same drawback applies also to Split (Spalato) and other Dalmatian harbours. The Yugoslav zone in Salonika is still awaiting settlement, and so Yugoslavia is left with Bakar, where the harbour is quite small and half an hour distant from the nearest railway station, so that all goods have to be reloaded twice, from the ship on to carts and from carts on to the train; and owing to the steepness of the road, a great many carts are required.

All this must be borne in mind in order to understand the Fiume question properly. The ideal port for Yugoslavia, as well as for the lands to the north of her, is Fiume, which before the War was developing into a successful rival of Trieste. All the conditions for successful commerce are present in Fiume. On the other hand, there can be no commerce at all, unless the latter is furthered by Yugoslavia.

This has been proved up to the hilt during the years of the Italian occupation. Grass grows on the quays that used to hum with life and work; all Fiume languishes. Once wealthy merchants try to make both ends meet by selling off their furniture and valuables, and no one in Fiume is satisfied except the ten thousand Italians from the kingdom who are in the pay and service of the Italian Government. That this picture is not overdrawn is shown very clearly by the attitude of the Fiuman Autonomist, or Zanella, Party. Though altogether Italian in sentiment, these old-established Fiumans, who originally hailed the Italian flag with rapture, will have nothing to say to an Italian Fiume. They do not want annexation. They realise that Fiume cannot live without Yugoslavia, and so they demand that the town be in deed (not only in name) a Free State, in a position to maintain friendly relations with Italy and Yugoslavia alike. In other words, the Fiume question must be solved on economical, and not on national political lines.

This was apparently achieved by the Treaty of Rapallo. Doubtless, by this Treaty Italian influence would be predominant in Fiume; but, on the other hand, Count Sforza's Supplementary Letter gave the port of Barosh and the Delta to Yugoslavia, thus ensuring that Yugoslavia should maintain her connection with Fiume and have an interest in preventing its economic decay.

If we furthermore consider that Italy preferred no claim to Fiume at the time of the Pact of London in 1915, and that the Wilson Line gave Fiume to Yugoslavia, we must admit that Yugoslavia is by no means intransigent in contenting herself with Barosh and the Delta.

When Signor Mussolini established the Fascist dictatorship in Italy everybody hoped that the evacuation of the third zone in Dalmatia would be followed by a settlement of the Fiume question. But, unfortunately, this has not come about. The present dispute in the Parity Commission in Rome in regard to Fiume is, in fact, solely over the wise Supplementary Letter of Count Sforza. Not content with Fiume, Italy is demanding Barosh and the Delta into the bargain. To this Yugoslavia cannot agree, as by such a settlement she would lose all and gain nothing.

That is the position of the Fiume question to-day. For the moment Italy has the best of it; but, in the near future she will realise that in ousting Yugoslavia altogether from Fiume she made a mistake, and that, first of all, from an economic point of view. For, if Yugoslavia is deprived of her interest in Fiume, she will simply turn elsewhere for a port, because without a port Yugoslavia cannot live. Already Mr. Davis is hard at work upon the enlargement of the harbour of Bakar, and the railway connection between the harbour and the station is also under construction. The Croatian paper Jugoslavenski Lloyd frankly commends that Yugoslavia should leave Fiume to economic death and develop her own harbours instead. And that is what is being done. The Dalmatian line will shortly be completed; only eight kilometres separate Split from Croatia. Plans are being made for enlarging the once world-famous harbour of Dubrovnik (Ragusa), and the construction of the great Belgrade-Cattaro line is seriously contemplated

The first consequence of Italy's policy will be that Yugoslavia will get on her own feet, whereas Italy will be left with a dead Fiume.

But in the field of politics the consequences for Italy will be even worse. An economic agreement over the Fiume question could give rise to good neighbourly relations between Italy and Yugoslavia. Italy might secure a good customer for her industrial output and obtain her raw material cheap from Yugoslavia in exchange. But the loss of Fiume will so aggravate national hostility in Yugoslavia that in the end Italy will lose the Yugoslav market for good and all. But whoever provides Yugoslavia with a door into the world will in return be master of the Yugoslav trade. And instead of a profitable friend Italy will have an embittered foe, and one who is no novice in the use of arms. Whether in view of Italy's policy of expansion this is of consequence or not, is not for us to decide.

In the interest of peace in Europe it is in any case to be regretted that Italy herself should regard Count Sforza's letter as insufficient, and that she is thereby making it next door to impossible for the Yugoslavs to get over the Treaty of Rapallo, which is throughout Yugoslavia regarded as the Canossa of Yugoslav diplomacy.

Messrs. Ransomes, Sims and Jefferies, Ltd., exhibit a 15-cwt. model of their patent runabout electric crane. This handy little crane, which is constructed on an entirely new principle, will travel, turn, hoist, and derrick under its own power, and will turn about its own centre like a turntable, the source of power being a battery of electric accumulators. The wheel system is so constructed that the crane will adapt itself to moderately uneven ground without detriment to its operation, and it will negotiate and operate on gradients up to 1 in 10. The model exhibited will pass through a doorway 10 ft. in height and 5 ft. 4 ins. in width. This firm also exhibit two models of their "Orwell" electric industrial trucks. Both models are fitted with large trailing wheels, and are of special value for use in places where the ground to be traversed is rough, and obstructions are frequently met with. One model is fitted with an elevating platform, a feature which renders possible a great reduction in the time during which the truck is kept standing idle for loading purposes. In addition, two sizes of the firm's electric motors are shown.

The stand of Messrs. the Ailsa Craig Motor Co., Ltd., is of special interest. The exhibits include a fast runabout launch fitted with the Ailsa Craig Kid four-cylinder marine motor, giving a speed of 14 miles per hour, and a standard work boat, fitted with the Ailsa Craig Kid Junior 6-8 h.p. marine motor, and having a speed of 8 miles per hour. The range of engines includes the Ailsa Craig Kid 10-14 h.p. four-cylinder marine motor and the Kid Junior of 6-8 h.p., together with larger models of $3\frac{1}{2}$-in. bore and $4\frac{3}{4}$-in. stroke. They are built in four-cylinder and six-cylinder models, developing 20-24 and 28-36 h.p. respectively.

Another notable stand is that of Messrs. Hollings and Guest, Ltd., who show a hydraulic tyre press for removing and fixing the solid rubber tyres of commercial vehicle wheels. A special feature is that the press is fitted with an open slot in the head, so that tyres can be fitted to or removed from wheels without taking the wheel from the axle. This type of press is capable of dealing with the largest and heaviest makes of tyres, and will give a pressure of 200 tons. Another interesting exhibit is a bending press for bending plates cold up to 6 ft. in width, as used for making safe bodies, tanks, conveyors, colliery tubs, and similar work. The press has a swinging column at one end, so that when a complete body or shape has been pressed, the column can be swung out, and the finished shape slipped from the end of the press head. The firm also show a hydraulic scrap metal bundling press. The press consists of a rectangular cast-iron box 27 in. x 15 in. x 30 in. deep with hinged cover. The hydraulic ram is arranged underneath this box, with a table which fits closely inside the box. The whole apparatus is let into the ground so as to bring the top of the box to a convenient height for throwing in the material. The box is filled with old tins and other material to be dealt with. The lid is then swung over, and the pressure turned on by the valve. As soon as the maximum pressure is reached, as shown by the pressure gauge, the operator releases the valve and swings off the cover, and the ram ejects the bale from the press. For the purpose of driving these machines a set of 2-throw hydraulic pumps is supplied. These pumps consist of a vertical 2-throw hydraulic pump, built up on a cast-iron bedplate, and driven by chain gears direct from an electric motor.

Competition.

The decline of £E6¾ millions in imports from the United States of America is so conspicuous that it may be of interest to analyse its principal items. Coal, wheat, and wheat flour account for over 4¼ millions between them; maize and maize flour contribute a further million and more; locomotives another half million; kerosene and fuel oil over £E400,000; while timber, railway sleepers, and caseboards are responsible for about half the last amount between them.

It is now possible, for the first time since the inauguration on July 1, 1920, of the special tariff applicable to cotton piece goods which fall under any of the five categories grey, bleached, printed, dyed in the piece, and dyed in the yarn, to compare its effects on imports for two complete calendar years. Statistics of the total value and number of square metres of piece goods under each of the five categories imported by the United Kingdom, Belgium, France, Italy, Japan, and the United States of America show that the United Kingdom's nearest rival in 1922 (as in previous years) was Italy, the increase both in quantity and value of whose imports of "dyed in the piece," and "dyed in the yarn" was proportionately much greater than that in the case of the United Kingdom, and whose imports of "printed" increased both in quantity and value as against a decrease in both from the United Kingdom. Further, in spite of an increased total quantity of piece goods from the United Kingdom, the total value has slightly decreased, whereas Italy's totals of value and quantity have increased by 40 and 33 per cent. respectively.

Italian competition has been noticeable in the following lines:—Woven plaid (labelled "Scotch" by Italian firms) manufactured from cheap yarn dyed in the yarn and generally with a raised back, and some of which contains silk stripes; this article competes with United Kingdom flannelettes. Besides this, one should mention 54-inch sateens dyed in the piece, creponettes, prints, fancy dyed brocades, striped voiles with artificial silk worked in, woven stripe reps, crepe stripes, cotton trouserings, 54-in. heavy Imperial coatings, muslins and furnishings, while cotton upholstering fabric from Italy alone appears to have a good sale in Egypt, as United Kingdom products thereof do not compete.

France has imported a certain quantity of velvets, silk cloth, and cotton crimps, but though her imports of prints have increased, those under the other four categories show a considerable falling-off. American plain imitation voile (mercerised plain cloth of quite presentable appearance), cabots, and imitation embroidered voiles known as Normandy fabric, also quite attractive, have had some sale in the Egyptian market, but other lines, such as printed organdie, and coarse plain cloth, do not appear to have met with much success.

Italian and French imports of some lines of woollen goods such as in particular low cross-bred serges and lower qualities of botany serges, have increased appreciably both in quantity and value, but do not as yet constitute a serious challenge to British supremacy in woollen textiles generally.

The value of cotton hosiery from Japan has fallen off by about 12 per cent., whereas German imports have risen, as a result of a nearly three-fold increase, from third place in 1921 (when she was only slightly ahead of the United Kingdom and Spain) to first place in 1922; while Japan has fallen to a good second from being easily first in 1921. The increase in German imports is, however, not so surprising in view of the depreciation during 1922 of the prices of the fine qualities of Egyptian cotton which would be required for the manufacture of these goods.

The virtually unchallenged supremacy of Syria in imports of mixed textiles, mainly of cotton for wearing apparel both in 1921 and 1922 is worthy of notice in view of the fact that their value has increased from £E48,000 to £E136,000, the corresponding weights in kilogrammes being 27,000 and nearly 77,000. Although these articles are made of silk and cotton, and specially manufactured in Syria for Oriental wearing apparel, it would appear to be worth the while of United Kingdom manufacturers to study the possibilities of meeting the increasing demand for this particular line in Egypt.

A striking instance of the abnormal advantage enjoyed by low currency countries is afforded by a comparison between the prices of neckties of Austrian and British manufacture. Austrian neckties, of better quality than the British article, can be purchased in Cairo, from the travelling representative of Austrian firms, at the equivalent of 2s. 8d. per dozen, as against 27s. 6d. a dozen for the same style of article ruling in London. It is also of interest to note that the broader ends of the Austrian necktie are a consideration for summer wear in Egypt, where waistcoats are seldom worn, while salesmen claim that its brighter colours and heavier texture also help it to compete so successfully with the British article. It is not, therefore, surprising that United Kingdom imports have fallen 50 per cent. while those of Austria have increased sixfold.

Egypt's total annual consumption of cement for the years 1919-1922 is estimated at 33,000, 66,000, 89,000 and 113,000 metric tons respectively, of which 25,000 tons in 1919 and 1920 and 50,000 tons in 1921 and 1922 were produced locally by the Massara "Portland" cement factory. For 1923, however, the total consumption is estimated at 150,000, of which 100,000 will have to be imported. Of the 63,000 tons imported in 1922 the bulk, viz. 38,000, came from Dalmatia, whose success as compared with British and Belgian imports is purely a matter of price, the c.i.f. Alexandria quotation being P.T. 220 for Dalmatian, as against 240 for Belgian and 280 to 290 for British. To these prices must be added about P.T. 40 for clearance charges in order to compare them with the Massara factory's quotations, which are for delivery at Alexandria, lower both than those of any imported cement, and than those for Massara cement ex-works near Cairo. As regards foreign cement, it should be noted that, although Dalmatian imports have increased from 23,000 metric tons in 1921 to 38,000 in 1922, Belgian imports have risen from 5,360 to 11,440, whereas British cement has only increased from 6,300 to 7,200 tons, and it is understood that Dalmatian imports will tend to decrease, but Belgian to increase still further in view of its superior quality over Dalmatian, and its price being lower than British. It is important to note in this connection that importers prefer British cement to all others because of its superior quality, and would buy it instead of Belgian if the difference in price between the two were only 2s. a ton instead of 8s. to 10s. as at present. In view of Egypt's increasing demand for cement in 1923, and possibly in subsequent years, owing to the house shortage and building activity so much in evidence in Cairo and Alexandria, it would seem to be worth the while of British manufacturers (whose cement is largely dependent for its sale in Egypt on the insistence by certain public authorities on the use of British "Portland") to study the possibilities of making the necessary reduction in their prices with the object of capturing the entire foreign supply of cement for private consumption, which will probably otherwise eventually become a virtual monopoly for Belgium.

1922 has been a light car year as the result, primarily, of wholesale conversion of Fiat and Chevrolet four and five-seaters, respectively, into taxicabs, particularly in Cairo, where the number licensed in 1921, viz., 308, increased to 612 in 1922; while in Alexandria the number rose from 234 to 383. The success of the light Fiat, in particular, and the consequent increased imports from Italy has been due chiefly to the fact that most of the taxicab companies are Italian, who have purchased the cars from the agents at what might be termed "wholesale" prices for a certain number but partly to their much greater handiness and reliability in the ill-regulated and heterogeneous traffic of this country, and their more economical petrol consumption than, for example, Chevrolet light five-seater cabs, which has recommended them in increasing numbers to private owner-drivers, particularly in the case of two-seaters now obtainable at £E. 360.

American imports, consisting chiefly of Fords and Chevrolets, and to a lesser degree of Buicks and Maxwells (which latter do not seem to appeal to local tastes), have doubled in numbers, whereas French deliveries have decreased considerably, although the popularity of a small yellow two-seater Citroën bids fair to improve the position of French imports during 1923. British light cars are, comparatively speaking, conspicuous by their absence.

THE LIUBLIANA SAMPLES FAIR.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

The Third Liubliana Samples Fair was opened on September 1, under the patronage of the King. Whoever saw the first Liubliana Samples Fair in 1921 and now visits the third has ample opportunity of judging what great progress Yugoslavia's young industry has made in these two years. The iron and steel industry, which was only in its (very creditable) beginnings then, has developed surprisingly in spite of financial difficulties. Several articles were decidedly better than the German goods in the same line, not only as regards usefulness, but also in the matter of finish. In the textile industry, which was practically non-existent two years ago, one noticed the excellent products of at least three native factories. The goods were of sound quality and in good taste as well. The number of exhibitors has grown from 534 to 776; 173 foreign firms were represented. For the first time, moreover, we had the opportunity of seeing British goods in evidence at a Yugoslav Samples Fair. There were textile goods, motor cars, bicycles, and liqueur (rum). Great interest was shown in the British exhibits, and it is to be hoped that the exhibitors will find themselves well repaid for their trouble.

PIRACY IN THE BLACK SEA.

A Reuter message from Sofia reports that the Amon, a Bulgarian sailing vessel, which left Varna for Constantinople on August 24 with a cargo of petrol, was attacked when some miles out at sea by pirates, also in sailing vessels, from the coast of Asia Minor. The pirates climbed on the Amon, and, after tying the crew to the mast, tortured them in order to make them divulge the whereabouts of any valuables on board. The pirates then set fire to the ship, and escaped with the spoil, which included £T28,000 in gold. The petrol exploded in the Amon and the vessel foundered. Only one member of the crew escaped and swam to land.

AGRICULTURE IN IRAK.

The following extracts are from the Monthly Agricultural Bulletin of Irak for the month ending July 15 :—

During the calendar month of June the mean maximum and mean minimum temperatures recorded at Hinaidi, near Baghdad, were 105·3°F and 75·3°F as compared with averages in Baghdad of 104·3°F and 76·0°F respectively for the previous 35 years. The highest maximum temperature during the month was 114·8°F recorded on the 27th and 28th June, 1923. The relative humidity was 31% as compared with a recorded average of 36%. A slight shower of rain, measuring ·02″, fell in Baghdad on the 2nd June, 1923.

The strong "Shamal" winds which set in early in June necessitated more frequent irrigation of all crops.

Stock generally is in fairly good condition. Large flocks of sheep are now congregating on the riverain and irrigated areas.

Water for irrigation is reported to be ample on most canals except those of the Dialah, where there has been unusual delay in constructing the temporary earthen dam across the river. Arrangements are in train to close the Sirriyah breach in the Euphrates near Fellujah. It is feared that most canals downstream of the breach will suffer from a shortage of water as the river continues to fall. The heavy floods have been favourable to rice cultivation in the Shamiyah and Amarah areas.

"Halawi" dates on left bank of Shatt al Arab and at Hatha show promise of good yield. At Abul Khasib the yield is likely to be well below the average, but the quality is expected to be good. "Khadrawi" dates continue to promise well. "Sayer" dates reported to be about 40 per cent. below last year's yield in Abul Khasib area. In Saliyeh, Hatha and Qurnah areas fair average yield of this variety is anticipated. The falling of immature dates is being investigated by the Entomological staff.

Except for about 500 acres destroyed by flood on the Saklawiyah, and 230 acres in the Dialah area and on the estate of the Mosul Farms Company, Ltd., the cotton crop in general is in good condition. The "spotted bollworm" is common in all cotton fields; the attack of this pest is reported to be earlier than usual. An agricultural officer has been stationed at Hillah mainly in the interests of cotton development. The measurement of all cotton fields is nearing completion.

Proposals have been submitted to combat locusts next year. The measures to be adopted must be comprehensive before they can be expected to effect a material amount of protection to cultivated crops.

The reeling of silk by departmental officials is in progress, and orders have been placed in Europe for 450 packets of silk worm eggs for next season.

The question of the high price of oil for fuel in oil engines has again been raised by pump owners. The cultivation of wheat and barley at present prices by lift irrigation is not economical. Near Baghdad 139 pump-owners are growing cotton this year as compared with 31 last year. Cotton is likely to prove an important factor in the development of pump irrigated lands. Owing to the relatively high price of oil fuel and in anticipation of cotton seed being a drug on the market in the near future a gas producer plant, using cotton seed as fuel, has been erected at the Government Farm, Baghdad, for pumping water. Except for minor adjustments it works satisfactorily.

The wool trade is unusually brisk. The wheat and barley crop is receiving the attention of a large number of exporting houses. The total exports of 1922 crop of cereals up to the end of May was 186,000 tons. The 1923 crop has started moving.

Light Railway Construction.

In few regions is the question of the improvement of communications of greater importance than in the Near East, as that territory contains so many areas still on the threshold of development, and the sine quâ non for any considerable economic advance is the provision of ready means of transport. Unfortunately, the circumstances of the last decade have added immeasurably to the difficulties of the improvement of communications. Before the War railway construction on the existing lines would have been the solution of the problem. Capital was not too difficult to obtain for such a venture, as there was a reasonable certainty of a fair return in the fullness of time. Unfortunately, it is no longer a matter that can be so simply solved. There is, for one thing, no comparison between the cost of construction in 1914 and the cost to-day, which means, of course, that, unless a greater revenue is to be obtained, the anticipated return must be greatly reduced. But is there any prospect of such an eventuality? All the evidence goes to show that not only must this question be answered in the negative, but that a lesser revenue must be looked for, if railways are run on the old lines. The reason for this is briefly the motor. Epoch-making inventions almost invariably make their appearance without their real significance being realised, and right up to 1914 it is extremely doubtful whether there was any general appreciation of what the motor was destined to become. We in this country know now since, as the result of developments in the last few years, what may be termed the motor age has been precipitated upon us. If it has made a vast difference to life in this country, whether as a means of ready travel or as a development which has made the existence of the foot passenger almost unendurable, it has had consequences scarcely less important in the Near East, and promises, indeed, to make an enormous difference to that region. Motor services are, comparatively speaking, easy to arrange, and points can be linked up that no railway would ever connect—we do not need to look outside this country to find examples of that—and where any extensive use is made of the motor in the Near East railways may expect to suffer. An illuminating sidelight on this is to be found in the speech of the chairman of the Egyptian Delta Light Railways at the general meeting of that company held not very long ago. He pointed out that the passenger traffic of the railway was suffering owing to the competition of motor-cars. It was difficult, he added, for the railway to compete with the low rates of the motor services, and in order to provide a more frequent and economical service and to reduce the fares to the necessary level steps were being taken to introduce light rail motor coaches capable of accommodating 30 to 40 passengers.

No one questions the necessity of railways any more than the utility of the motor. The railway is, and will remain, the indispensable means of transport, no matter what developments take place in regard to other means of locomotion. That being admitted, it will be evident that a serious position would be created, if conditions rendered impossible the adequate development of railways in the Near East; for that region will require in due course a very large extension of existing lines. The problem is one that must be solved; and it would seem that the solution consists in the adaptation of new methods in certain districts to the railway. A system known as the Roadrail system of traction has been introduced, and is now in successful operation in Uganda and elsewhere, which promises to solve effectually the question of railway construction. The principle of the system is to obtain the maximum tractive force of the engine or tractor while at the same time retaining the low tractive resistance of the load. The driving wheels of the engine or tractor run on a specially prepared road-like surface, while the carrying wheels run on the rails, the effect of this being that it is possible to use a lighter section of rails. It is claimed for this system that it combines the advantages of the light railway and the motor at a lower initial cost of construction and equipment and a more economical cost of operation. A comparison of the cost of the construction of a light railway and of a road railway brings out very clearly its advantages. A light railway of 3 ft. gauge, a considerable part of which was laid on a public road, cost £3,333 per mile to construct. It is estimated that the cost of a road railway in similar conditions would be about £1,250.

Further railway construction would meet only part of the problem, for provided the roads are passable a motor has no limits to its operations, and it is obvious that the potential field of this means of communication could never be covered adequately by light railway construction. There are, however, other possibilities. In these columns some weeks ago I discussed the introduction of a new appliance known as the "Motorailer," which enables motor vehicles to be run on the railways as well as on the roads. The utilisation of this device might help to make railways indifferent to motor-car competition, while there is, finally, the possibility of railways operating their own motor services. There is wide scope for the extension of communications in the Near and Middle East, and whether it be by railway, motor-car or caterpillar tractors, the thing to aim at is the opening up of fresh routes, and to this end there should be room for all comers.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson report as follows for the week ended September 5:—

Egyptian Futures.—During the week under review business in Egyptian futures has been on quite a limited scale only, such orders as were received being comparatively of small weight and requiring much patience to execute owing to the almost total lack of speculative interest shown in the market at present. Friday, on which day the Government report of the American crop condition was issued, was by far the best session of the week for trading. Continental buying orders appeared, and these gradually absorbed a fair quantity of Novembers which had been on offer at 16d. for some days previously. Once these were exhausted, further offerings were scarce, and the market advanced steadily another farthing, November eventually touching 16.27d., on which level hedge selling made an appearance. Later in the week Continental profit-taking ensued, and the market fell away again, finally rallying in the neighbourhood of 16d. for November delivery. We do not look for any material change in the immediate future.

Egyptian Spot.—Pending the issue of last Friday's Bureau report, all markets adopted a waiting policy more or less, with the result that a considerable falling off occurred in the inquiry for spot cotton at the beginning of the week. The unexpectedly "bullish" nature of the report, however, provided a useful stimulus, and a fair demand was at once in evidence again, but was held in check unfortunately by the sudden political crisis which occurred on the Continent. Nevertheless, during the last day or two the demand has shown signs of broadening out, and it seems not improbable that buying may become more general as the month progresses, provided, of course, that no more shocks are received calculated to displace confidence in the general situation. On September 1 our market was opened officially on a Saturday for the first time in eight years, and although no spinners made their appearance, a fair amount of buying of spot cotton took place over the telephone, thanks chiefly to the Bureau report of the night before. The week's inquiry may be summarised briefly under four headings:—Fully Good Fair Sakellaridis at about 90 points on November contracts. Good Sakellaridis at about 200 on November. Fully Good Fair Uppers at about 16½d.-16⅝d., and Low cotton at 8d. to 12d. The bulk of the business has taken place, as usual, in the first-named quality, the basis for which has again hardened. Signs of scarcity are apparent, and likely lots are much sought after. Sakel cotton below Fully Good Fair is practically non-existent. Uppers are very scarce, and are readily saleable at the price mentioned. The demand for Low cotton is persistent, but not very fruitful. In Sudan cottons a fair business has taken place, some 600 bales changing hands. Forwardings to spinners for week ending 31st ult. were returned as 6,214 bales. Estimated sales, 3,300 bales. Quotations of Sakels are raised 25 points, those of Brown and Uppers ten points on the week. Fully Good Fair Sakel to-day, 16.80d.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

A Better Tone.

The "Manchester Cotton Trade Review" of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended September 8 states:—

The somewhat better tone referred to in our last report has persisted during the present week, although it is difficult to find any substantial basis to justify it other than the last American Agricultural Bureau Report which has, in the opinion of most people, indefinitely postponed the prospects for cheaper raw cotton. As we anticipated, the latter has been a strong market throughout the week.

Yarn.—Following the increase in the price of raw material, quotations for yarn, whilst still irregular, have been advanced by approximately 1d. per lb. on last week. In these circumstances business has naturally continued to be difficult to negotiate. There is no noticeable improvement of demand for American spinnings.

Cloth.—There has again been a fair enquiry and in certain lines, noticeably Dhooties for Calcutta, rather better business has been done, although generally speaking the market remains in a very weak condition. A little more business has been done for China and also for Egypt, but as a rule merchants are operating with great caution all round.

Raw Cotton.—As already mentioned, a firm market has been experienced following the Bureau report. A sharp rise took place on Saturday last followed by small declines on the succeeding three business days, whilst on Thursday and Friday there was again a considerable advance. Much interest is shown in the possible course of prices during the next few months. If growers put large quantities on the market at an early date in order to raise funds, there may be a temporary fall, but the opinion generally held appears to be that raw cotton will be dearer before the end of the present season. Closing prices are as follows:—American Fully Middling, 16.22; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 17.05.

THE PLIGHT OF THE COTTON TRADE

In an article in the September issue of the Nineteenth Century, Sir Charles Macara, chairman of the Provisional Emergency Cotton Committee, writes as follows on the causes of the present condition of the cotton trade:—

The real causes of the present depression are, first of all, that the cotton industry has been built up largely on overseas trade. England, as already stated, has not only to import the whole of her raw cotton, but after spinning and manufacturing it she has to depend on overseas outlets for over three-quarters of her trade. Thus it is that, while other cotton-manufacturing countries make chiefly for their own requirements, England is dependent on settled and prosperous conditions abroad for taking off four-fifths of her production, and therefore has been singularly unfortunate since the war. India, our best customer, not only found herself with high-priced goods bought at the top of the boom which she has had great difficulty in disposing of, but she has been unable to sell her own products in Europe owing to the war conditions which still prevail; China, our next best customer, has been afraid to give out orders owing to civil war conditions in the interior of the country; Turkey, another great consumer of cotton goods, has until now been in a state of war with the Allies for nine years and has been unable to trade freely; and Germany, Russia, and other countries have been in a state of turmoil and have had no chance of doing business on the old lines. Add to this the fact that cotton has been scarce and at a fabulous price, and even now costs nearly twice as much as in pre-war days, and one can understand the difficulties with which the staple trade of Lancashire has been faced.

But on the top of all this there has been a domestic problem which has made things more difficult still, and which, if not solved quickly, threatens to bring the whole industry to ruin. I allude to the senseless competition which has been going on for the past three years among home producers. Instead of facing the situation boldly and refusing to work at a loss, a policy has been adopted of making more goods than demand justified, with the inevitable consequence that forced sales have followed and weak sellers have made it impossible for anything like a fair market price to be maintained. In this way many millions of capital have been squandered, and shareholders, instead of receiving a fair return for the money invested, have, in addition to losing dividends, incurred heavy and increasing losses of capital. Naturally, such a policy has been made the most of by buyers of yarn and cloth, and trade, instead of being encouraged to develop on stable lines, has been restricted to a hand-to-mouth minimum.

COTTON IN ITALIAN SOMALILAND.

According to the Milan correspondent of the Manchester Guardian Commercial the cotton-growing experiment in Italian Somaliland having proved a complete success last year, the area under cultivation has this year been increased. Egyptian cotton of the Sakellaridis type is now being grown on an area of 1,075 hectares, as against 480 last year, and the crop is estimated at 4,000 quintals (400 tons), as against 2,594 quintals (260 tons) last year. The ginning and baling plant has been supplied by Lancashire firms.

An exhibition of cloth, glass, chemicals, and other goods is being sent by the Soviet Government to Persia with Persian placards and catalogues.

Messrs. Cammell, Laird, and Co., Limited, of Nottingham, have received an order from the Great Indian Peninsular Railway for the supply of seventy-seven motor and trailer coaches. This stock is required by the railway company in connection with their scheme for the electrification of the Bombay suburban lines. The new coaches will be similar in design to those recently constructed by Messrs. Cammell, Laird for the same railway.

THE SMYRNA SULTANA MARKET.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, report as follows for the week ending August 25 :—

The estimated arrivals on the Smyrna market since the opening of the season are put at 1,670 tons, as compared with 2,800 tons in 1922, and sales to date are estimated at 1,350 tons, as compared with 2,250 tons at this time last year. Total shipments to the United Kingdom to date are estimated at 345 tons (970), to the Continent 40 tons (0), and to the United States, Canada, and "Sundries" 210 tons (120), the figures in brackets being the corresponding totals last year.

Business attained progressively more activity through the week, purchases reaching the maximum at the close, when about 25,000 boxes were taken up on Saturday. Prices in local currency are firmer, in spite of weaker exchanges, thus increasing quotation in foreign currencies to some extent. Arrivals are coming to market slowly, owing to transport difficulties. At present level of prices, which may be regarded as low in relation to currants and other growths, demand is developing on broader lines, and with the probability of no great rush in arrivals, the reaction in prices this week is likely to be maintained or even to become more marked. The course of exchanges, always an unknown factor, will have considerable bearing on foreign quotations.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

Italy and Greece.

During the present week the liquidation of the trouble between Italy and Greece arising out of the murder of the Italian military mission in Epirus will have been advanced a further stage. In accordance with the terms imposed by the Conference of Ambassadors the Greek Government will have conveyed its apologies for the murders to the Allied Powers, a funeral service in honour of the victims will have been held in Athens, the Allied flags will have been saluted by the Greek navy, and honours will have been rendered to the bodies of the victims as they are being embarked at Prevera. An Inter-Allied Commission of control will be sitting at Janina to supervise the investigation carried out by the Greek Government into the crime of August 27, and on its report on the details of this investigation it will depend whether Greece surrenders the whole of the fifty million lire deposited as security or is allowed to have the indemnity to be paid assessed by the International Court at The Hague. Up to this point the terms of the Conference of Ambassadors bear, as the Italians claim, a close resemblance to Signor Mussolini's ultimatum to Greece which was delivered under the expressed conviction that the assassins were Greek. The Ambassadors have it to their credit that they have secured from the Italian Government a definite pledge to evacuate Corfu on September 27, but they have not been strong enough to require the nationality of the assassins to be established before any penalties were exacted.

The Lesson for Greece.

It will carry with it no extenuation of the Janina crime if the Greek Government is complimented on the scrupulously correct attitude that it has adopted throughout the negotiations. In this connection Greece may have been fortunate in having at the head of affairs a group of men who have no political career at stake to prompt them to compromise between the only rational course to be pursued and an attempt to safeguard their position with the Greek public. It is to be hoped, however, that the lesson of the Janina murders will not be lost upon Greece. She will have paid the penalty for the crime, even if it be established that the culprits were not Greeks, and, unless further steps are taken in the matter, she will have no certainty that a similar outrage may not be committed at any time on the same or another frontier. In the political excitement that will shortly engross the nation there is a danger that nothing will be done to cope with this serious menace. If there is to be peace in the Balkans it is essential that the komitaji element should be removed, and this can be done only by an understanding between, and by common action on the part of, all the States concerned.

Balkan Unity.

One of the first steps taken by Signor Mussolini on finding himself in difficulties with Yugoslavia on the top of his quarrel with Greece is understood to have been the sounding of Bulgaria with a view to involving her in Italy's quarrel. If the allegation is true, Signor Mussolini's conduct is deserving of the strongest denunciation. The enmities of the Balkan States have been a menace to the peace of Europe for the last two generations, and until these enmities have been eliminated the menace remains. But here is the responsible head of a Great Power deliberately seeking to continue the divisions of the Balkans for his own petty ends. Bulgaria, we may hope, will have taken the measure of the Italian Prime Minister, while Yugoslavia and Greece ought to have brought home to them with redoubled insistence the necessity of closing the ranks of the Balkan States against interference from without. This can be done only by a candid discussion of all the questions that help to keep the peoples apart at the present time. Elections are pending in most of the countries, and as soon as these have been held serious consideration should be given to the problem of promoting Balkan unity.

Yugoslavia and Bulgaria.

Unity is not likely to be furthered by the representations which the Yugoslav Minister in Sofia is said to have made last week to the Bulgarian Government, informing it that in the event of any komitaji band attempting to cross the frontier the Yugoslav Government would consider the attempt a casus belli, and would dispatch troops into Bulgaria to occupy strategic points. A situation of this nature calls for plain talking. If, as is quite possible, komitaji bands on the Bulgarian side of the frontier are preparing to raid Yugoslav territory, the komitajis are Macedonians who have been forced against their will to become Serbian or Yugoslav subjects, have refused to acquiesce in the treatment meted out to them by Government officials, and have "taken to the hills" rather than submit. It is true that Bulgaria incurs a moral responsibility for allowing her territory to be used as a place of refuge for Yugoslav subjects and their jumping-off ground for reprisals; it is also possible that for one reason or another the present Bulgarian Government has not made the fullest use of its opportunities for coping with these bands. At the same time it must be remembered that Bulgaria has a wholly inadequate army even for the maintenance of internal peace—if the estimates of the strength of these bands are accurate the komitajis outnumber the Bulgarian regular troops —that the present Government is having difficulty with the Agrarian Opposition and Communists, and that no Balkan country has ever yet coped satisfactorily with the komitaji curse.

The Better Way.

The very stiff Note sent to Bulgaria suggests that the Yugoslav Government is either venting its spite against Italy on Bulgaria, or, having heard of Italian intrigues in the latter country, is anxious to get its blow in first. Reflection must satisfy the Yugoslavs that in their present action they are merely playing Signor Mussolini's game, which was to weaken Yugoslavia by a threat from the rear. The only adequate rejoinder to the Italian Prime Minister is to close up the ranks of the Balkan States. The Yugoslav Government knows as well as anyone that the komitaji trouble is due to the injustice of the Balkan settlement, which has forced Macedonians to become Yugoslav or Greek or Bulgarian subjects against their will. The Nish Agreement between Yugoslavia and M. Stambolisky's Government was virtually an arrangement for placing the recalcitrant Macedonians between the Yugoslav and Bulgarian armies, and wiping them out of existence. There might then be peace in the Balkans, but it is to be hoped that Europe will not tolerate such barbarous methods of dealing with a problem that ought to have been properly settled by the Peace Conference, and is capable of a settlement which will not prejudice the real interests of any Balkan State. Until autonomy is granted to Macedonia—it can quite well be within the orbit of the Yugoslav State—there will be no peace in the Balkans, and the Macedonians will be a source of weakness to the three States concerned. Yugoslavia has it in her power to bring about a genuine settlement in the Near East, if she will call a conference of the Balkan States to deal with the Macedonian question. In the meantime she should tread warily in imitating the Corfu incident, for fear that the League of Nations will prove less complacent in having its covenant violated by a small Power.

The Fiume Problem.

It is good news that the crisis which threatened over the question of Fiume has been postponed, if not averted, by Italy's decision to resume negotiations on the subject. As we suggested in these pages last week, the Italian Note to Yugoslavia claiming freedom of action on September 15, in the event of the Yugoslav Government's rejection of the settlement proposed, may not have been technically an ultimatum; but, coupled with Signor Mussolini's announcement that he would not accept the arbitration of Switzerland, it augured ill for a peaceful solution. The Italian Prime Minister would seem to have been reminded that reference to Swiss arbitration was specifically provided for in the Treaty of Rapallo, to which Italy had affixed her signature, and it may also have been pointed out that repudiation of a treaty, in addition to a breach of the Covenant of the League of Nations, tended to place Italy in an entirely false position in the world's eyes. Be that as it may, the Italian Government has decided to try further for a settlement by negotiation. It is difficult, however, to see how a satisfactory solution can be reached until Italy realises that the mere possession of Fiume, even with Port Barrosh, will not bring prosperity to the town. As far as Yugoslavia is concerned, the potentialities of Port Barrosh are not of sufficient importance to justify war with Italy. The question, however, has a sentimental interest for the Croatians, and the Belgrade Government appreciates the necessity of avoiding the charge of being willing to sacrifice Croatian interests. If conditions in Yugoslavia were normal, the Government should have little difficulty in satisfying public opinion in Croatia on this point. Thus Yugoslavia labours under a further disadvantage from the unhappy divisions of its component parts.

Yugoslav Differences.

A consensus of opinion in Yugoslavia prevails outside the ranks of the Croats that the departure of M. Raditch has seriously embarrassed his followers and played into the hands of the Radical Party. It is probably too early to decide whether this is actually the case or not. The arguments in favour of a federal system of government for the Triune kingdom as against a highly centralised administration are so convincing that it would be strange if the federal movement could not survive M. Raditch's absence. The history of the country for the last three years creates distrust in these optimistic forecasts of stability for this or that political régime, and suggests that differences of opinion are too fundamental to be overcome by more or less artificial election results. Fortunately the country is making satisfactory headway in the material sphere, but M. Pashitch in his various tenures of office has brought the people no political progress. As a younger man than his great opponent, M. Raditch is prepared to bide his time, confident that the principles for which he stands command the support of a majority of the Yugoslav people, and will ultimately prevail. The trouble is that Yugoslavia must suffer in the mean time. It would be thought that, if M. Pashitch has any inkling of the inherent defects of his own centralised system, he would prefer to guide the country to the inevitable compromise rather than to know that, as soon as he is gone, his work will be entirely undone.

Zaghloul Pasha.

Zaghloul Pasha has returned to Egypt, and the scenes attending his arrival in Alexandria suggest that he has lost none of his popularity with a certain section of the Egyptian people. It remains to be seen what use he proposes to make of this undoubted asset. The fact that some of the crowd should have started stone-throwing, presumably at the police guarding the route, will serve as a reminder to Zaghloul Pasha that by some at least of his followers his presence will be interpreted as a signal for disorder. If, therefore, he is now to play a constructive part in the building up of independent Egypt, he will have to correct the impression that he is necessarily to be found in opposition to constituted authority. He is credited with being dissatisfied with the arrangements so far made between Egypt and the British Government; but for the sake of Egypt it is to be hoped that he will decide to build on what has already been achieved rather than attempt to pull down afresh. The country stands in need, after a period of marking time, of a constructive policy, and given goodwill on both sides, many of the outstanding problems are capable of being solved smoothly, without putting independent Egypt out of its stride.

Transjordania.

"Revolution in the Near East" may make a good heading for a newspaper poster, but it is hardly an accurate description of a minor outbreak in Transjordania. The first report was to the effect that the Emir Abdullah's "camp," presumably the capital, Amman, had been attacked by Adwan and Belk tribesmen, who sustained heavy losses. In the absence of more definite information it may be surmised that the collision between the tribesmen and the Emir's forces was the outcome of an incident that occurred a week or two previously. As a reward for services rendered against the Wahabis the Emir returned to the Beni-Sakhr tribe a sum of money collected as taxes. The sheikhs of Es Salt and the neighbourhood resented this action and demanded that the money should be returned to the Treasury. A meeting was called by the Emir to discuss the matter, and the sheikhs of Es Salt presented a number of demands which pointed to several other grievances than the matter in dispute, and reserved to themselves "liberty of action," if the demands were not granted. Emir Abdullah promised to consider the proposals, and it is possible that he may not have seen his way to grant them. There is plenty of inflammable material in Transjordania which is capable of spontaneous combustion, and there is no need to attempt to attribute to Palestine responsibility for supplying the spark when a fire takes place.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

The League of Nations.

The matter that has everywhere been discussed during the past week has been the position of the League of Nations. Some assert that it performed very useful work in the Italo-Greek crisis, in the sense that it crystallised public opinion and presented it in solid form to the Ambassadors' Conference; others deplore its lack of initiative and its weakness in handing over its own proper affair to the Ambassadors; while others roundly assert that it has been killed by Signor Mussolini. The first is the view of those who, like Lord Hugh Cecil, are, except when their own country is concerned, virtually for peace at any price; they belong to a class which, while it contains neither idealists nor realists, and can, therefore, have no permanent effect in the world's history—for, confessedly, it concentrates on the temporary—yet is undoubtedly increasing in numbers. To the second class belongs a strangely mixed class of men—sentimentalists, intellectuals, and, generally speaking, the preferrers of the abstract to the concrete. In other times, without doubt, their wholly logical cry of "Justice before Peace" would be more widely heard and attended. And the last class is made up mostly of our essential "Die-hards," who, in fact, prefer men to measures, and acts to principles.

It is not difficult thus to categorise the different strands of opinion; but perhaps it is not of so much use as it might be, because already the fickle minds of this country are changing their opinions. One is almost forced to the conclusion that in this country few men have any real, fundamental political convictions. For the attitude of the majority of men to Italy in these last crises has been childish in the extreme. At first they preached, in the best and most impossible English style, to Signor Mussolini; then, yielding all hopes of his conversion, they reviled him; and, now that he has done what they wanted, though entirely in his own way, they once more are making out their former filibuster to be a statesman! It is, one must repeat, a sad lack of principle that makes men so quickly change their ground, and it seems to be the chief mark of modern English thought. Politically, the War has taught us very little.

The Policy of Compromise.

In effect, those who think that the recent European settlements have been happily made, and that it is injudicious to point out potential or actual holes in the patchwork, are worshippers of the policy of compromise. Now until recent times a sense of and an ability to compromise were commonly supposed to lie at the basis of all Britain's success, and, from a domestic point of view, those who hold that England's greatest history has been made since Elizabethan times have a strong argument. But in the wider world, especially in Europe, compromises do not work so well, and those who in present circumstances would rather see justice done than peace achieved probably have the wisdom of time on their side. Of course, the believers in compromise may say that it is not necessary, even if one concentrates first and last on peace, to do any permanent injustice; but you may ask them in return whether, if their own principles or policy were universally applied, the world would be lapped in peace. They all answer in the negative; they all think the world is in a worse state now than it has been for many centuries; they all, in brief, know that the short view is the wrong view. But, then, they will not see, neither are they interested in, the winners of the long run.

A Necessity of Action.

It is true, I believe, that the worshippers of the moment are increasing, so very pressing nowadays are the things that appear to matter, so much more remote than formerly are the things that really matter; but side by side with this development is an intense desire, growing daily stronger, to see something done. Of those who bemoan the plight of Europe, the danger of continental Bolshevism, the wickedness of France, and so on, you may pointedly ask "What would you do?" and you will surely get no practicable reply. The world admittedly—and everyone is saying this every day—is all wrong and mad, but the compromisers, except in the smaller affairs, get us nowhere. It is astonishing to hear intelligent men at once reproach France as the author of most modern ills and yet support our present Government. I do not suggest that our Government should have acted in any particular way—because I happen to believe that the French lay-out of Europe has more chance of endurance than any that we might have produced (it must have been a compromise between the Latin and the Teutonic view of Europe), but without any doubt at all this growing French supremacy is extremely disliked here, and the Government is being blamed for allowing it to develop under its eyes. Action, and not advice, from the Government is what our people are now crying for.

Protection and the Wool Trade.

One often hears it said that Protection and Free Trade are the only political issues that cause division of opinion nowadays; however that may be, division has certainly been caused by the decision, taken the other day, by the Bradford Chamber of Commerce, to ask for protection in the woollen industry, protection both for the raw material and for the finished article. For a long time the Yorkshire woollen industry has thriven on Free Trade, but now, owing to foreign competition and the state of the exchanges abroad, it is suffering hardly; unemployment there is terrible. Even so, our doctrinaire Free Traders will not admit the desirability of Protection, and dilate dismally on the inevitably increased charge on the consumer; but our Protectionists, on the other hand, are almost gleeful at the necessity of protecting one of our staple industries. The ordinary man loses patience with both of the parties which make a fetish either of Protection or Free Trade; if, through the application of either, temporary difficulties may be overcome, then, he says, let us have it. But a general refusal or a general welcome are things with which he has no sympathy. The matter is one not of principle, but of expediency only, to be proved by practice alone.

The Birth-Rate.

Of all the addresses that were delivered at the British Association, which met last week, the one that excited as much interest as any was that given by Dr. Vaughan Cornish, who spoke on the population factor in the destiny of the British Empire. Some of our modern apostles of progress are all in favour of a decrease in our birth-rate: not so Dr. Cornish. He believes that the prosperity and security of this country and of the Empire depend, on the contrary, on an increased rate. The British Overseas Dominions must, if their purpose is to be fulfilled, be furnished with Britons; if Britons fail, assuredly some other people, not sharing the ideals of the Empire, will step in. But such a scheme as this, admirable as it is, depends, in the first place, upon a better distribution of industry at home; at the moment, the cry for immigration to the Colonies falls to a large extent on deaf ears. It is easily realisable that if our colonial markets are fully developed, our home industries will always be busy. No doubt the importance of our birth rate will be brought up at the Imperial Conference; but whether we shall see in the near future what most British statesmen would like to see—a very large movement from this country to the Colonies—is, perhaps, open to question.

Papyrus and America.

There was always one thing more important than the Italo-Greek crisis, and that was whether Papyrus, the winner of this year's Derby, would or would not go to America to race the best representative of the U.S.A. During the past week both problems were resolved, and, contrary to the public's wishes here, Papyrus is to go. The majority of the sporting world were against the race, even before the failure of Papyrus in the St. Leger; now the contest is more than ever unpopular. To an ignoramus this present decrying of the American proposal is a little bewildering; France, for example, sends her horses to us, and we make no great cry about it. It is inconceivable that Papyrus will be as handicapped by the American climate, atmosphere, water, and so on, as, say, the West Indian cricketers were by our weather; so that one is sorry to see in our "racin' journalists" so much attempt to write down the race before it has been won. Papyrus is an excellent horse, and the probability is that if an American horse beats it under equal conditions it is not good enough.

THE EGYPTIAN SEASON.

A meeting is to be held in London on September 25 and 26 of representatives of the Egyptian State Railways, the Sudan Government Railways, the Palestine Government Railways, the Wagons-Lits Company, and of steamship companies interested in the Mediterranean or Nile services, as well as of the hotel companies of Egypt and the largest tourist agencies of Great Britain and the United States, to discuss arrangements that have been made or have yet to be made for the Egyptian tourist seasons 1923-24 and 1924-25. A feature of the tourist traffic to Egypt these days is the big touring party, several hundred strong, arriving on a large vessel, with a full programme crowded into a comparatively short time. As may be imagined, the arrival of two or more such parties at the same time in any one town in Egypt or Palestine imposes a serious strain on the local accommodation. One of the objects of the meeting next week will be to attempt so to organise the big tours that they will not overtax the accommodation available on the railways and in the hotels. The first effort in this direction was made last September, with satisfactory results; but, in view of the heavy bookings for the coming season, the need for perfecting organisation is more urgent than ever. Credit for the steps that are being taken to this end is due to the Egyptian Promotion Association, whose labours stand not only to benefit Egypt, but also to add materially to the comfort and pleasure of visitors.

The Elections.

The Prime Minister's recent circulars to Mudirs and Governors, urging them to hurry on the correction of the electoral rolls, the first compilation of which was such a fiasco, seem to have had their effect. It is stated that the lists will be completed by the day fixed—September 10—and that the polling for elector delegates will take place on September 27. A royal decree has been issued to-day fixing the latter date and also making it a public holiday. Government officials will be provided with free railway travelling to and from their constituencies, to enable them to exercise their right of voting. The second stage of the elections should take place about a month after the choosing of the elector delegates and, another month later, the senatorial elections. It appears, therefore, that the two Houses should be constituted by the early part of December, which would enable the Premier's promise that Parliament should meet early in January to be fulfilled, with something to spare.

Zaghloul Pasha.

The imminence of the elections has not led to any marked increase in the activities of the political parties. The Wafd holds occasional meetings in various parts of the country, but, at the moment, all parties are awaiting the return of Zaghloul Pasha before they settle down in earnest to the struggle. The hold which the aged leader still exerts upon the imagination and affection of a very large number of his compatriots is extraordinary. As soon as it became known that he would return in the near future, everything else sank into insignificance. It is no exaggeration to say that upon the line which Zaghloul Pasha takes depends not only the prospect of a peaceful transition of the election period, but also the chances of negotiations with Great Britain being undertaken in the near future. If Saad Pasha throws his influence on the side of progress along the lines which have been followed during recent months his return will have the happiest results. If, on the other hand, he comes out with a denunciation of the present Government and the work it has done, the passing of the Indemnity Act, the Foreign Officials' Compensation Act, the drafting of numerous laws to replace British Martial Law, and so on, the position of the present Government will be very difficult. It is always unwise to prophesy, especially in Egypt, but Zaghloul's lieutenants here are already exulting in the prospect of the trouncing which their leader is, according to them, going to administer, not only to his dearest opponents, the Liberal Constitutionals, but also to the Yehia Ministry, which has "bartered away the nation's rights." The Wafd has embarked on an intensive campaign against the existing Government, declaring it to be essential that the conduct of the country's affairs during the difficult election period should be in the hands of a Ministry which shall enjoy the confidence of both the King and the Wafd. It is not disguised that the Premier whom they have in view to replace Yehia Pasha is Tewfik Pasha Nessim. Nessim Pasha is one of the most remarkable figures in Egyptian politics to-day. His 1920-21 Ministry was, perhaps, the most unpopular with the country as a whole that has ever held office. It was subjected to unceasing attacks by the Wafd, Nessim Pasha's life was more than once attempted, and when he ceded the helm to Adly Pasha in the spring of 1921 he was advised not to live in his own house, on account of the great danger of his being assassinated. Zaghloulist students used to amuse themselves at that time by throwing dead dogs, with the label "Nessim" around their necks, into the ex-Premier's garden, as a small token of what they thought of the garden's owner.

A Believer in "Divine Right."

In the early part of last year Nessim Pasha was appointed head of the King's Cabinet. The position suited Nessim Pasha admirably, for if there ever was a man who believed in the divine right of Kings it is he. His politics are a combination of religious piety and intense loyalty. Nessim Pasha devoted all his energies to improving the position of the King in the eyes of his people. How successful were those efforts was indicated by the fact that when, in March 1922, the ruler of Egypt, from being a Sultan, became a King, the notables who went to the palace to congratulate His Majesty were pelted with tomatoes and rotten eggs, whereas six months later when King Fuad, in company with Tewfik Pasha Nessim, visited the Al Azhar Mosque, the enormous crowd gave His Majesty a tumultuous welcome. This complete change was directly due to the efforts of Nessim Pasha, who worked with signal success to induce the Wafd, previously almost openly disloyal, to recognise His Majesty. Nessim Pasha, at the same time, worked for the downfall of the Sarwat Cabinet, in which, also he was successful. Nessim Pasha's assumption of office was greeted with joy by the Wafd; but it was not long before the enthusiasm cooled, and before even the three short months which the Nessim Cabinet lasted had ended the Zaghloulist executive had begun to attack their late ally. History has repeated itself again this summer. Exactly the same process has gone on as last year. The Wafd is now once more intensely loyal, and Nessim Pasha is acclaimed as the super-patriot. Everything possible is being done to embarrass the Yehia Ministry, which is going through much the same experience as the Sarwat Cabinet of last year. Once again the Wafd hopes that a Nessim Cabinet will be formed in the near future. Thus Nessim Pasha has in two years twice known the joys of extreme popularity, once been in danger of his life from the hatred of the mob, and more than once been regarded with mistrust. All this without ever changing his principles in the least, for he is a Diehard of the kind that never changes.

The Late Princess Abbas Halim.

Some ridiculous stories have followed the death of Princess Abbas Halim. There is a very widespread belief that her death was a mystery which has not been cleared up. Nothing could be farther from the truth. There probably never was a case in which it was possible to say with more certainty that death was accidental. Every particle of evidence fitted with the theory that the Princess was cleaning her revolver, not knowing it to be loaded, when it went off and killed her. In fact it is impossible to reconcile the known facts with any other manner of death.

Similarly, absurd rumours have been put about regarding the disposal of the deceased lady's estate and the alleged rival claims of her last two husbands. Some of these stories have been sent to London newspapers, though there is no truth in them and they must be very unpleasant to Prince Abbas Halim and his sister-in-law.

IRAK.

Baghdad, August 28.

The Overland Mail.

This letter leaves by the first overland mail to be taken by the Nairn Transport Company, and sent via Haifa and Port Said. The mail is due to leave Baghdad at noon on August 30, and it is expected that letters will reach London in ten days, or as quickly as the air mail. The cost per letter will, however, be threepence less than by the air mail. This is only a trial run, but it is hoped that the regular weekly service by this route will commence in October.

Cholera.

Interest in the elections, never very great, has at the moment almost entirely given place to interest in the cholera epidemic. Though it has now abated very considerably in Abadan and Basrah, an average of over ten new cases daily is still being reported from both of these places. In Baghdad there have been only five or six cases, and it is confidently hoped that the dangers of its appearing here in epidemic form are now small. Strict precautions have been taken by the Air Force authorities to prevent the spread of infection to the troops, and no cases have yet occurred among military details.

Persia and Irak.

Feeling between Persia and Irak shows no sign of becoming less strained. The Persian authorities have posted a notice in Kasr i Shirin saying that no passes are to be issued to pilgrims desiring to proceed to holy places in Irak. This action will affect somewhat seriously the revenues of the Irak railways, but otherwise is likely to have little effect on the country. It may, however, reduce the number of professional beggars in the holy cities.

September 5.

The cholera epidemic has subsided in Abadan and cases have now fallen to four or five a day. In Basrah, however, the average remains at 14 to 15 new cases daily, and in Baghdad it is beginning to assume epidemic proportions, some six or seven new cases coming to light each day. There have also been cases at Ali Gharbi and Amarah, a fact which shows that it is beginning to spread and that it has not been possible to confine it entirely to the towns of Basrah and Baghdad. The measures which it has been found necessary to take in order to check the spread of the epidemic, have included the suspension of third class traffic on the railways and on the river steamers between Basrah and Baghdad. This measure, though giving rise to much complaint, has done much towards keeping the disease more or less under control.

ABYSSINIA.

Addis Abeba, August 20.

Abyssinia and the League.

In my letter last month I referred to the pressure at present being exerted by public opinion abroad upon the Abyssinian Government to introduce reforms, and I suggested that, in view of the reluctance of a powerful section of the Abyssinian people to accept reforms of any sort, the Government were likely sooner or later to find themselves confronted with an embarrassing situation. From the events of the past few days it would appear that the element in the situation which exercises most the minds of the Abyssinian Government is the possibility that such pressure may supply both the excuse and opportunity to one or other of the Powers most interested in the country for interference in the internal affairs of Abyssinia. This has raised anew the bogey of loss of independence, and their fear lest the discussion of slavery by the Assembly of the League of Nations next month may be made the occasion for some proposal aimed at their independence, has hastened a decision to put into practice an idea with which they have been toying for some months past. This is to apply for the admittance of Abyssinia to membership of the League of Nations with the object of securing what they believe membership will automatically give to them—namely, a guarantee of their independence by the thirty odd States comprising the League.

The suggestion that this application should be made to the League was submitted formally to the consideration of the leading chiefs of the empire about two months ago, and secured their unanimous approval. I understand that the Government asked for, and received from each of these chiefs, an assurance of his willingness and power to carry out in his own province any obligations which the Government might incur as a result of admission to the League.

The Mission to the League.

The Government, having cleared the ground as far as their own people were concerned, communicated with the Secretariat of the League, and arranged for the reception at Geneva of a Mission charged with the duty of making the formal application to the Assembly of the League. This Mission left Addis Abeba on August 13, and will reach Geneva before the end of the month. It is evident that the Government regarded the immediate despatch of the Mission as of urgent importance. Dajazmach Nado, the head of the Mission, arrived only on August 9 from his Province of Goré, in the far west of Abyssinia. He had been compelled to undertake the journey at the height of the rainy season—no light matter. He was not sufficiently recovered from his arduous journey to be received by the Government until August 11. He had, therefore, only two days in which to be primed for the part he is to play. The haste of the Government was, I think, due to the fact that they are anxious that their application for admittance to the League should be considered by the Assembly before that body embarks upon the discussion of slavery. It is a clever attempt to seize the bull by the horns.

There is no doubt that the decision of the Abyssinian Government is in the best interests of their country. It may be that the motives of all the parties to this decision have not been the same. It is probable that the majority of the chiefs who were consulted looked upon the proposal merely as the provision of a convenient bolt-hole from an embarrassing position. They felt they were being rounded-up, and if the League really provides, as they have been led to believe, a sanctuary from the inconvenient attentions of the foreign busybodies, so much the better! There are others, however, who are more far-seeing. They have recognised for some time past that the inevitable tug-of-war between the old order and the new has at last begun, and they realise that the struggle can only end in one way, and that if Abyssinia is not saved from within, it will be reformed from without. When they consider the problem of reform from within, three facts immediately emerge. First, that the Abyssinians themselves do not possess at present either the experience or the administrative capacity to conceive or to carry out the requisite reforms, and that it will be necessary in the long run to call in foreign advice and assistance. Secondly, that it will be difficult to secure the acquiescence of their own people in attempts to introduce reforms of any sort, because the population—the Abyssinian portion of it, that is to say—are easily swayed against the Government by the cry that the country is being sold to the foreigner, and the mere mention of reform is enough to raise this cry from the many vested interests which stand to lose by any change in the old order of things. Thirdly, that even if the acquiescence of the majority of their own people could be secured, the Abyssinian Government is not strong enough in a military sense to maintain law and order, let alone to impose reforms. Let Abyssinia, however, gain admittance to the League of Nations, the Abyssinian Government, they say, will be able to convince their people that their independence is so firmly secured that the employment of foreigners to bring the administration into line with modern requirements will constitute no menace to it. Moreover, from the League they will have some hope of obtaining advice and help that will be really disinterested. Finally, it cannot be doubted that they expect that Abyssinia within the League will be able to secure that reconsideration of the question of the supply of arms to the Abyssinian Government which Abyssinia outside the League cannot get. The plain fact is that they set down the restrictions imposed by the Powers on the entry of arms into Abyssinia to the policy supposedly pursued by Great Britain—of reducing Abyssinia to a state of impotence for her own nefarious ends. They believe that a consideration of the matter by a disinterested authority like the League will lead to their obtaining an adequate armament under reasonable guarantees against misuse, and they regard the obtaining of this armament as an indispensable preliminary to the administrative reconstruction which must precede reform.

A Representative Mission Necessary.

The more intelligent Abyssinians realise that before the Assembly of the League can grant their request for admission, they will be called upon to produce, in the words of the Covenant of the League, "effective guarantees of their sincere intention to observe their international obligations," and that in view of the recent agitation on the subject of slavery in the European Press the guarantees which they offer are not likely to be taken at their face value. This side of the question gives them some uneasiness; but, in any case, it is doubtful whether they anticipate any definite result from the present Mission, which is not of a composition to enable it to enter into any unforeseen engagement on behalf of the Abyssinian Government.

It is probable that the present Mission will obtain valuable information and experience which will prepare the way for a subsequent Mission really representative of the Abyssinian Government and of the Abyssinian people. The ideal composition of such a Mission would be the Regent, Ras Tafari, himself, with one or two of the most powerful chiefs representing the main divisions of the Abyssinian Empire. The arrangements made and the agreements entered into by such a delegation would secure the acceptance of the country as a whole as those of no other delegation could.

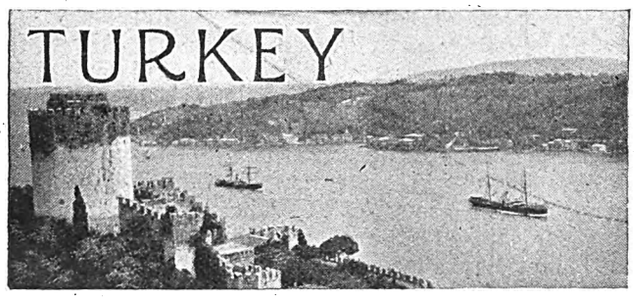
The Abyssinian Government are undoubtedly making an effort to grapple with their difficulties, and they should be given every encouragement. The Abyssinians are the sole remaining independent native State of Africa. They are on a plane above the other African races. It should not be forgotten that they have upheld the Christian faith for fifteen centuries, cut off almost entirely from contact with, or knowledge of, the civilised world, and surrounded by a ring of Mohammedan or pagan States. Now that such contact is beginning to take place, it is only fair to recognise and to respect the spirit which determines them to maintain their independence, and to endeavour to educate them to take their place among the free nations of the civilised world. Such a task—the regeneration of independent Abyssinia—is pre-eminently a worthy and fitting one to be entrusted to the League of Nations.



Constantinople, September 11.

The Government's Programme.

The event of the greatest importance during the past week has been the enunciation, on September 5, by the Premier, Fethi Bey, of the main lines of the Government policy in the Assembly. The main points on which the Government proposes to concentrate are the reform of the finances, the question of public security, the improvement of the situation of the Government officials, and the reorganisation of public instruction. Pride of place was rightly given to the problem of the State finances, for it is upon the solution of that problem that the realisation of the other plans of the Government entirely depends.

Criticism of the Government.

The Government's critical compatriots have devoted much space in the Press to the Premier's speech, and their criticisms, though perfectly sound, are not constructive. They all point out that schemes of reform cost money, and that balancing the budget is not necessarily the panacea for all the ills which the country has inherited from years of war and the old régime. The promise to reduce the tithe impost from 12 per cent. to 10 per cent. is naturally welcomed in Anatolia, where that tax on agriculture is chiefly felt, and the Constantinople middle-class Turk regards that move as an election device to strengthen the position of the Government in Anatolia, which has been showing numerous signs of restiveness, because the long-heralded millenium has not followed immediately upon the victorious campaign and the glorious peace for the attainment of which the Anatolian peasant has made the greatest sacrifices.

The fact is that the Government is now going to pass through the most critical stages of its career. If it can succeed in weathering this first period of disillusionment of the country at the delay in redeeming rather extravagant promises, it will probably carry on without serious convulsions, but it would be a mistake to take its estimates of the loyalty of the mass of the Turkish nation to the new régime too seriously.

Fictitious Wealth.

The numerous academic discussions on somewhat fantastic projects for the creation of various banks for the economic development of the country, the anxiety concerning the chances of Messrs. Kennedy and Chester raising the necessary money in America to carry out the works included in their gigantic concessions, and so on, show which way the wind is blowing. The Ikdam tried a new ballon d'essai the other day, when it described an alluring project of an Egyptian bank, financed by "richissimes" Egyptian magnates, whose sole aim and object in life is apparently to purchase gorgeous villas on the Bosphorus and settle down to a life of ease and gaiety there while expending their millions in putting Turkey upon her feet again. A delightful prospect for everybody except the Egyptians, who may be supposed to prefer the fleshpots of Cairo.

The Development of Anatolia.

There has been a great storm during the past few weeks on the subject of a supposed resuscitation of the old Tripartite Agreement between England, France, and Italy for the economic partition of Anatolia. It arose from a misapprehension in Turkish circles concerning the negotiations going on between British, French, and Italian capitalist groups on the subject of the exploitation of the Anatolian railways. The conjunction of the three Powers in the railway affair put the Turks into a fright, and we have been treated here to impassioned reiterations of their determination to avoid the renewal of the political and economic slavery of the past. They are a little cooler at the moment, but not by any means reassured; meanwhile certain semi-official details concerning the work of reconstruction which is being done on the railways has been published. The service between Constantinople and Angora has been improved, and the express does the journey daily in twenty-six hours. The railway stations have been completely rebuilt at Eski-Shehir, Afium Karahissar, Bilejik, and at a number of smaller places. Work is proceeding satisfactorily on the Smyrna-Karahissar line, and on the Panderma-Smyrna line the permanent way reconstruction is almost complete. The question of destroyed bridges is the most difficult. Wooden temporary bridges have in most cases replaced those destroyed; but final replacement of these temporary structures by permanent bridges is delayed owing to the non-arrival of the material ordered in Germany. Now it is beginning to be delivered, and a commencement has been made at re-erecting the bridge over the Meander at Serai-Keuy. It is also reported that sleeping and restaurant cars have been ordered from Europe for the Constantinople-Angora line, and when these are delivered the service will be still further improved.

Strikes.

As a slight indication of the Europeanisation of Turkey, the epidemic of strikes which has recently afflicted us may be cited. Here in Constantinople the slaughtermen and compositors have gone on strike, and the personnel of the Golden Horn Ferry Boat Company threatens to do so. In Anatolia the British-owned Aidin Railway were the sufferers. As regards the strike of slaughtermen here, it has served to convince the Vali, Haidar Bey, that the way of the efficient reformer is thorny. From time immemorial until a few weeks ago the consecrated method of transporting meat from the slaughterhouses to the retailers was to load a limp, sanguinary carcase, or part thereof, on the back of a hamal, who transported it to its destination, walking in the middle of the narrow pavement of the busiest streets in the busiest and hottest part of the day. You steered clear by walking in the road in the track of on-rushing motor-cars, which frequently forced you back against the perambulating butcher's shop. This has now been done away with, and replaced by the red-painted motor-lorries of an enterprising firm which has obtained the tender for all the transport of meat. The authorities and the company have been roundly abused by both butchers and slaughtermen because a profitable business had been granted to an efficient foreign concern, and the result was a strike which brought the Vali down at 9 a.m. to the slaughterhouses, where, apparently, he took a strong line. The strikers have now practically capitulated, and we are again supplied with meat.

The strike of the Turkish compositors is still going on, and the Turkish Press is confined to one combined paper run by the proprietors and another run by the men. The strikers are demanding a five-hours' day, 3 to 8 p.m., for morning papers, and 9 a.m. to 2 p.m. for evening papers. The other Press organs in English, French, Greek, Hebrew, and so on, are not affected by the strike.

Memorial Services.

The series of farewell functions and ceremonies in connection with the Allied Evacuations was continued by the holding of memorial services at various Allied cemeteries. The French Christian and Moslem cemeteries were the scene of such ceremonies, and on September 8 a most impressive service was held at the British Crimean Cemetery at Haidar Pasha for the dedication of a memorial stone to the members of the British forces who have died in these regions during and since the War. There are in the cemetery 350 graves of British officers and men, who, with the exception of seventeen who died as prisoners of the Turks, have died here since the Armistice. The memorial stone, which has been erected on the summit of the cemetery, is of the standard type erected by the Imperial War Graves Commission; two others will also be erected later, one in memory of British Hindu dead at Osmanie, and another in memory of British Moslem dead at Mashlak. General Harington, who was accompanied by Admiral Brock, Mr. Henderson, General Charpy, and General Mombelli, unveiled the memorial, which was dedicated by the Principal Chaplain to the Forces, and wreaths, sent by the Army, the Australian and New Zealand Governments, and many others, were afterwards laid upon it. It may interest readers of THE NEAR EAST to know that the cemetery, which occupies a beautiful site near Florence Nightingale's hospital, overlooking the Sea of Marmara, is extremely well kept; it contains numbers of fine trees, and there are large quantities of flowers; it is one of the pleasantest places to wander about, and provides a mournful but interesting souvenir of the part British soldiers and sailors have played in Turkish affairs for over seventy years.

GREECE.

Athens, September 7.

The Græco-Italian Incident.

Despite the extraordinary measures taken by the Greek authorities, who are assisted in their work of investigation by Captain Reed, sub-chief of the British Police Mission to Greece, despite also the offer by the Greek Government of a reward of one million drachmæ for any information which would lead to their discovery and arrest, the murderers of the Italian General Tellini and his four brother officers are still at large. The Greek theory that the perpetrators of this dastardly crime—whether they be Greeks or Albanians—have made good their escape over the other side of the border, is probably very sound. Apart from the fact that the Italian officers met their death at a distance a little less than three miles from the Albanian frontier, there is the evidence of the five shepherds who witnessed the whole drama from neighbouring hills, and who declare that the murderers, six in number, were attired in Albanian costume, and escaped into the dense forest leading into Albania. Up to the time of writing the Greek Government has not received a reply to its request that an international commission be allowed to carry on investigations both on Greek and Albanian territory; it is confidently believed, however, that the Council of Ambassadors will not reject this perfectly reasonable request, which may eventually lead to the removal of the stigma with which Italy was only too ready and too glad to brand her helpless Balkan neighbour.

The Occupation of Corfu.

The news of the Italian bombardment and occupation of Corfu was received by the Foreign Office soon after five o'clock last Friday afternoon, and half an hour later a hurried Council of Ministers was held to discuss the situation. By that time, however, several journalists who were waiting at the Press Bureau began to suspect that something serious was happening, and the news eventually leaked out. At 7.30 the Hestia published a special edition, which, however, by order of the Censor, refrained from mentioning the bombardment, merely announcing the occupation of the island. The truth was not generally known until 9.30, when an official communiqué was issued by the Revolution. Athenians were at first too surprised to be angry. Some people would not even believe it. They could not understand how a nation could commence hostilities against another nation and at the same time have a diplomatic representative calmly going about his business in their capital! Theatres, cinemas, and other places of entertainment promptly closed their doors, and every square, café, and restaurant in Athens became a centre of groups of patriots expressing common indignation at Italy's high-handed action. I actually saw an old man crying after reading the official communiqué! On Saturday nearly all the morning papers appeared with a black mourning border, presenting a remarkable contrast to the numerous white spaces left by the Censor in the place formerly occupied by bitter anti-Italian articles. One newspaper, the Eleftheros Typos, was suspended for twenty-four hours (it is believed by request of Signor Montagna, the Italian Minister) for publishing an article entitled "The Fugitives of Caporetto," while the overpatriotic Censor official who omitted to suppress the article in question was immediately relieved of his duties. Strictest measures were adopted by the Government to prevent an outburst of anti-Italian feeling, seeing that there are very nearly two hundred thousand Italian subjects in Greece, mostly Salonika Jews. All gatherings and demonstrations were forbidden, and an armed guard consisting of an officer and thirty men was posted outside the Italian Legation to protect Signor Montagna and the Legation staff. Guards were also assigned to the Italian Consulates in Athens and the Piræus, as well as to many of the leading Italian business firms. In view of the censorship's firm attitude, the newspaper comments were generally restrained after Saturday; they were uniform, however, in condemning the Italian action as illegal and rash, and even the most fanatical anti-revolutionary organs supported the Government's decision to place the whole matter before the League of Nations.

The double game which Italy played during the early stages of the episode caused a very painful impression to both Greek official and foreign diplomatic circles here. While in Athens Italy joined Great Britain and France in handing a more or less mild Note to Greece protesting against the Yanina murders, at the same time she had already taken an independent action of a most unusual character, without previously consulting, and even without the knowledge of, her Allies. It is an open secret here that Signor Montagna, who was the author of the first Italian Note presented to Greece, had prepared a second Note, practically amounting to an ultimatum, by which only five hours were given to the Greek Government to accept or to reject Italy's demands. The contents of the second Note were telegraphed to Signor Mussolini for approval, but, on being informed that a collective Allied Note was about to be presented to Greece, the Italian Premier overruled Signor Montagna's draft Note, and ordered the occupation of Corfu before either the Powers or the League of Nations could protest or intervene.

The Attitude of Greece.

On the other hand, Greece's attitude has been absolutely correct throughout the unfortunate affair. As the Premier, Colonel Gonatas, said to me the other day, Greece, with her conscience clear regarding her conduct, has acted in a most honourable fashion, as a law-abiding member of the League of Nations, and as a peace-seeking factor in the family of the European States. Greece, added the Greek Premier, is now awaiting tranquilly and with full moral strength the next developments in a question which can no longer be considered as affecting merely Greece and Italy, but the whole civilised world. "We are placing our case before the world with full confidence that at least our principles are sound, and if we fail that would mean disaster not only for us, but for the whole fabric of international justice and morality."

September 8.

The Note of the Conference of Ambassadors was presented this afternoon to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Alexandris, by the French Chargé d'Affaires. The terms of the Note differ widely from the old Italian demands, and are practically identical with Greece's counter-proposals which Italy rejected. A council of Ministers will be held to-morrow morning, after which, I understand, the Greek reply will be handed in, and thus reach Geneva in time for discussion at next Monday's session of the League of Nations. It is generally believed that Greece will accept unreservedly the terms of the Council of Ambassadors.

Another Græco-Italian Incident.

While dining last night at a seaside restaurant in Phaleron, the Military Attaché of the Italian Legation in Athens, Colonel Peroni, heard a Greek, dining with his wife at the next table, order some macaroni, to the accompaniment of a sarcastic remark regarding the Italian national dish. Colonel Peroni, losing his self-control, approached the unsuspecting Greek and struck him a heavy blow with his walking-stick across the face, inflicting a deep gash on the cheek. The other diners promptly rushed to their compatriot's assistance with uplifted bottles, plates, and even chairs, and only the timely arrival of the police rescued the Italian Colonel from an extremely awkward position.

IN SMOOTHER WATERS.

The sudden storm that troubled the waters of the Adriatic is in process of dying down. Last week the hope was expressed in these columns that Italy might prove even better than her implied pledge by losing no time in withdrawing her troops from Corfu. She has now undertaken to evacuate the island on September 27, and she is to receive the whole of the fifty million lire deposited by Greece as security with a Swiss bank if on that date the assassins of General Tellini have not been discovered and Greece can be shown to have been negligent in searching for them. If the murders had taken place in China there would have been no difficulty in obtaining volunteers for execution in the event of the real authors not appearing, but on the Græco-Albanian frontier the chance of bringing home the crime to one particular band must appear remote even to the optimistic Conference of Ambassadors. A satisfactory settlement, therefore, will depend on the Greek Government's ability to satisfy the Allied Commission under whose supervision the inquiry into the murder is being carried out that its efforts to track the murderers have been whole-hearted. We can but hope that unanimity on this point either in the Commission or in the Conference of Ambassadors will not be a sine qua non; for, although it is difficult to imagine any reason that would impel Greece to shield the assassins, there has been no indication that Italy has abandoned her contention that the Greek Government or Greek officials were the instigators of the crime, and under this conviction the most strenuous methods of investigation, if unsuccessful, may simply be denounced as lacking in thoroughness. Until September 27, therefore, the crisis cannot be said to be over; but at the moment the indications are favourable.

It is a strange feature of the solution of the Græco-Italian crisis that all the parties to it find support for their own point of view. Italy has no doubt that she has won all along the line; Greece, as befits her unfortunate position in the matter, is not going to spoil the good impression created by her correct attitude in very trying circumstances by expressing satisfaction at the way things have gone; but she must be conscious of having been rescued from a worse fate. To the Conference of Ambassadors belongs the credit for having liquidated the crisis. It has taken no very heroic line, at least in public. A certain degree of firmness may have been necessary to secure the decision for evacuation by a specified date, but it has acquiesced in the payment in certain circumstances of an entirely vindictive penalty. As far as the League of Nations is concerned, there is to be no settlement of the controversy raging round the part that it has played in the dispute. Some, convinced from the outset that the League was worthless, point to the present episode as confirmation of their theory; more vigorous opponents rejoice in the League having administered, as they think, to itself its own deathblow. Mr. Lloyd George, who claims to be a sincere friend of the League that he helped to bring into existence, is satisfied that its "authority" has been destroyed. He would have the League either flabby, to the extent of doing nothing unless both parties to a dispute agree to accept its arbitration, or a sabre-rattler to the extent of urging one or more Powers "to take whatever measures were necessary to force the recalcitrant to submit." Fortunately, an increasing number of people are coming to realise that the primary object of the League is to prevent a disturbance of the peace. There could be no question of the Council at Geneva ignoring a matter officially submitted to it by one of its member-nations, and to its credit it lost no time in acting. A strong argument in favour of secret diplomacy will be provided if the League is to be judged by telegraphic summaries of its debates rather than by its official action. In referring the Græco-Italian dispute to the Conference of Ambassadors, it took the quickest and surest route to the maintenance of peace, as the event has abundantly proved. In different circumstances other measures might have been called for; but in the face of the fact that peace has been kept, it seems hypercritical to condemn the League for having discovered the one effective means to that end.

It is true that Signor Mussolini announced urbi et orbi that he would have none of the League's interference; but it remains to be seen whether even this stout utterance will kill what two score of nations are determined to uphold. As a world organisation the League is not yet complete, and its machinery is not yet perfected. The country that will break its pledge by resorting to an act of war before submitting its dispute to arbitration will naturally denounce the competence of the League whose covenant it has violated. The League, however, was never forced upon Italy; of her own free will she gave certain pledges with the object of safeguarding the world's peace. If Signor Mussolini elects to violate Italy's pledge at the first opportunity, his action does not invalidate the soundness of the League as an international instrument for peace, although it may emphasise its limitations, which were known to all. Italy by another agreement undertook to submit in certain circumstances the Fiume question to the arbitration of Switzerland. Signor Mussolini announced his intention of breaking that pledge as well; but it is Italy and not Switzerland who will suffer from this mania for violating pledges, when she finds the whole world on its guard against her. Already Signor Mussolini has appreciated the wisdom of trying to gloss over his second repudiation, and negotiations with Yugoslavia are to be continued. Whether the restraining existence of the League of Nations or a realisation that Italy cannot afford to regard all her engagements as "scraps of paper" is responsible for Signor Mussolini's second thoughts may never be known. Italy as a nation supported her Prime Minister in his vigorous action for obtaining redress for the Janina murders, but must be exonerated from any desire to risk a fresh war. That for a moment Signor Mussolini was prepared even to face the latter may be inferred from his attempt to compromise Bulgaria in his quarrel with Greece and Yugoslavia. It is to be hoped that the Sofia Government, in spite of the flattery implied by such an attempt, will not add to its country's troubles by an injudicious policy at this particular moment. For the smaller States of Europe the League of Nations remains their one sheet anchor. They need believe no one who says that it has been weakened or who would seek to persuade them to set less store on honourable membership of the League than on the invidious rôle of a hanger-on of this or that Great Power.

IRAK'S NEIGHBOURS.

[In our issue of September 6 we published that part of Sir Percy Cox's recent "Report on Irak Administration" (October, 1920, to March, 1922) dealing with Irak and Nejd. We here extract the remainder of his account of Irak's foreign relations. —ED.]

Until the signature of the treaty between Great Britain and the 'Iraq,* together with the confirmation by the League of Nations of the relations between the two Governments, the international position of the 'Iraq is necessarily ambiguous. Pending a definition of 'Iraq nationality, laissez passers have been issued by the 'Iraq passport authorities and Divisional Advisers, while in the case of 'Iraqis abroad arrangements are being made for their issue by British Consular representatives.

Relations with Turkey.

Throughout the period under report the 'Iraq Government has been in the anomalous position of having, in Turkey, a neighbour theoretically in a state of armistice, but, in fact, clearly hostile. Apart from the political effervescence which the efforts of the Kamalists have maintained on the Kurdish frontier, the economic effects have been serious.

The Sanusi.

Turkish propaganda has been associated in the main with the name of Shaikh Ahmad al Sanusi. In January, 1921, he was first heard of as having arrived in Diyarbakr from North Africa; in April he was reported to be in Mardin, and in May he was spoken of as being either the Turkish candidate for the throne of the 'Iraq or else the deputy of Burhan al Din Effendi, a son of the Sultan 'Adbul Hamid. The candidature of Amir Faisal was the signal for an intensive effort to advocate his cause. A large number of his manifestoes found their way to Mosul and other parts of the country. They were violently anti-foreign and pan-Islamic in tone, and no less singularly ineffective. Arab Nationalist hopes and Islamic ideals were alike satisfied by the qualifications of the Amir Faisal, and his arrival in Baghdad was immediately followed by the submission to himself of those chiefs of the Shammar Jarba' who had remained in close touch with the Turks and had been in March the recipients of lavish decorations. It was a decisive rebuff to the pretentions of the Sanusi, or rather to the anticipations of his principals, for he is himself a typical darwish, devoid of initiation and used merely as mouthpiece. In December, 1921, rumours were current that he was to be set up as the ruler of a semi-independent Trans-'Iraq State, embracing Jazirah, Rawanduz and Sulaimani, but a scheme of this nature would seem to combine every element of failure, and the Sanusi himself is generally believed to be highly dissatisfied with his position and anxious to return to his own country.

The complete lack of success which has attended Turkish propaganda among the Arab tribes on the frontier was further exemplified by the return to the fold in June of Daham al Hadi, who had been one of the recipients of Turkish honours. He is the favourite grandson of the old chief Al 'Asi, who is probably still the greatest name among the Shammar. Daham has been given rights of cultivation at 'Awainat, within the 'Iraq frontier, while Al 'Asi is cultivating extensively at Rumailan, the nearest point on the frontier to Nisibin. The Tai, who are nominally in the French zone, have been forced by their proximity to the Turks to enter into relations with the latter, and Bulaibil, the chief of the small Albu Hamad tribe, has maintained a robber band near Jazirah, but the successful bombing of his encampments in June, 1921, in retribution for his attacks on barges on the Tigris belonging to the inhabitants of Zakho, led to a pronounced diminution in his activities. Aeroplane action was also taken over the frontier in August, when Naif Beg of the Miran Kurds crossed the Tigris to raid the Hassanan in the neighbourhood of Faishkhabur. (At the end of March, 1922, Naif Beg was seeking permission to settle in 'Iraq territory.)

Turkish Propaganda Among Indian Troops.

Turkish propaganda has also been directed against the loyalty of our Indian troops, in the form of circulars in Urdu emanating either from Angora or from Pan-Islamic associations in Anatolia. Muhammadan troops were urged to murder their officers and desert to Mustafa Kamal, who was preparing a great army for the extirpation of the infidel and the liberation of the holy places of 'Iraq. The effects produced by these appeals were imperceptible, and since July the dissemination of pamphlets of this nature has ceased.

Kamalist Difficulties with the Kurds.

On the Kurdish side, the Kamalists have had troubles of their own. In January they were forced to take measures, attended with no great success, for the subjection of the Hawerki, and in October they attacked Shernakh with a considerable force, partly composed of tribes at feud with 'Abdul Rahman Agha, Shaikh of Shernakh, who has been practically independent since the armistice. He has been at pains to cultivate friendly relations with the British authorities, and on the arrival of the Amir Faisal he, with other Kurdish leaders, expressed to the latter their willingness to accept him as King and to form part of the 'Iraq State under conditions of local autonomy. When the Turkish attack developed he was obliged, owing to lack of ammunition, to come to terms. During the winter he refused all invitations to present himself in Jazirat ibn 'Umar, but in February, when, as a result of the Angora Agreement, the Kamalists had been able to increase their force on the 'Iraq frontier and to place outposts as far as the vicinity of Zakho, along the foot of the Shernakh hills, he found himself obliged to give way to Kamalist threats and visited Jazirah. Even then he did not agree to Turkish schemes for an offensive against the 'Iraq.

Kamalist Efforts at Rawanduz.

Within the 'Iraq borders such success as the Turks have met with has been obtained in the Rawanduz area, and is due to the insurgence of the Surchi chiefs of 'Aqrah and malcontents of Rawanduz. In May, 1921, measures were taken against the Surchi, as a result of which Batas was reoccupied and the Surchi chiefs made submission, with the exception of 'Ubaidullah and his half-brother Raqib. The political atmosphere showed every sign of clearing, and overtures had been put forward by the Rawanduz leaders, when in June a new factor was introduced by the appearance of a Kamalist official with a small Turkish reconnaissance. Active propaganda was instituted among the tribes, and by the end of July the Turkish force had been increased to about sixty rifles, with a gun and two machine guns. The police post at Batas was attacked on July 31 and forced to surrender; ten days later the Pizhtgelli section of the Khushao under Ahmad Beg delivered an unsuccessful attack on Rania. The local tribes rallied to the British authorities, Babakr Agha of the Pizhder was as unwavering as ever in his adherence, and operations conducted in the Shaur district by a combined force of levies and tribesmen, with aeroplane support, brought the villages to submission and obliged the small Turkish military element to beat a hasty retreat.

Nevertheless, the presence of the Turks was a continuous menace to local peace, and in September a force of levies and police, supported by aeroplanes, entered Dasht-i-Harir and inflicted punishment on the tribes. Again the combination of native forces and aeroplanes gave highly satisfactory results. As a result of this action 'Ubaidullah made submission, paid up a fine of rifles and ammunition, and accepted responsibility for the maintenance of law and order in Dasht-i-Harir. But for the second time the Kamalists upset the equilibrium, and the arrival, in December, 1921, of Turkish reinforcements amounting to eighty men, with ammunition and three machine guns, shook the favourable resolutions of 'Ubaidalluh, who on December 14 treacherously attacked a levy reconnaissance at Babachichik between Arbil and Harir. This ambush led to operations by levies, police, and aeroplanes on a larger scale, with salutary results, though they involved the loss of two British officers. The tribesmen were demoralised and disheartened, the Turkish force was reduced to about seventy men, and the leading insurgent chiefs, with the exception of 'Ubaidullah, made overtures to H.M. King Faisal, and were given permission to come in under safe conduct, a permission of which they have not yet availed themselves.

Sulaimani Frontier.

On the Sulaimani side intensive anti-British propaganda, carried out through the medium of the Persian Kurdish chiefs of Aoraman and of Mahmud Khan Dizli, was the feature of the end of the year 1921. Mahmud Khan, chief of the village of Dizli in Persia, had been concerned in the rising of Shaikh Mahmud in 1919. He was captured by the Persian Government in 1920 and handed over to the British authorities. After a term of imprisonment in India he was released in September, 1921, and allowed to proceed to Sulaimani, under a guarantee that he would not cross the Persian frontier. This condition he promptly broke; he returned to Dizli and wrote to Mustafa Kamal asking for arms to enable him to drive the British out of Sulaimani. Late in December several petty Aoraman chiefs, who were undoubtedly in touch with him, entered the Halabja plain and proceeded to collect taxes. In the middle of January a levy force was ambushed near Halabja in an attempt to recapture a local suspect, and suffered casualties which included the British officer in command, Captain Fitzgibbon. An attack on Halabja was averted by highly successful aeroplane operations, and Mahmud Khan Dizli returned across the Persian frontier. His followers continued to commit depredations in Halabja plain until, in March, threats conveyed by aerial reconnaissance persuaded him to put himself into communication with the British authorities.

With regard to persons connected with Shaikh Mahmud's rising of 1919, his brother 'Abdul Qadir and distant relative, Gharib Ibn 'Arif, together with his follower, Shaikh Ahmad, were released from Henjam under the amnesty in May. The two first-named are living at liberty in Baghdad, while Saiyid Ahmad was allowed to return immediately to Sulaimani. Shaikh Mahmud and his brother-in-law, Shaikh Gharib ibn Ma'ruf, were released from prison in India in January, and are at present in Kuwait, where they are retained as political detenus pending their ultimate return to Sulaimani.

Rumours of Kamalist Attack.

Throughout the past year, rumours of an impending Kamalist attack on 'Iraq were persistent, and after the conclusion of the Angora Agreement caused serious anxiety. The fact that the headquarters of the 3rd Division were transferred to Sa'airt had, without doubt, grave significance; the garrison at Jazirat ibn 'Umar was strengthened and small posts placed along the frontier. It was at this moment that the rallying of the Assyrian refugees and their enlistment in great numbers in the levies, as has been recounted, proved of signal value, and as this report closes it is increasingly unlikely that the Kamalists can venture on an attack in force in the immediate future. But until the conclusion of peace between the Allies and Turkey finally stabilises the situation, the threat from the north cannot be disregarded, while Turko-Bolshevist intrigue will continue to be a menace to the 'Iraq State.

Persia.

In January, His Majesty the Shah, travelling strictly incognito, passed through the 'Iraq on his way to Europe. On his arrival at Baghdad he was met by myself and representatives of the King, but the private character of his journey precluded any official reception.

Pusht-i-Kuh.

Relations with the Wali of Pusht-i-Kuh have been mainly concerned with the vexed question of the Wali's right to levy grazing fees on those sections of the Bani Lam who are accustomed at certain seasons to graze their flocks in Pusht-i-Kuh territory. In former days before the fixation of the Turko-Persian frontier, the Bani Lam were accustomed to graze free in what the Wali considered his limits; in return for which a small present of a horse or a few rifles was given to the Wali. On the conclusion of peace, however, the Wali claimed the right to collect the full tax in respect of the flocks grazing in his territory and based his claim on the contention that the custom whereby the Bani Lam had formerly escaped such tax had arisen solely out of the indeterminate nature of the boundary and that, since the fixation of the boundary by the Boundary Commission in 1914, there remained no justification for the custom. Attempts to induce the Wali to forgo his claim and to continue the old friendly custom of reciprocal free grazing rights between himself and the Bani Lam proved unavailing, and, as the Wali's claim was legally justifiable, there remained no option but to recognise it. This decision is by no means pleasing to the Bani Lam Shaikhs, who resent as a reflection on their dignity the necessity of paying the Wali for what they have received for generations by custom. The tension thus produced between the Wali and the Bani Lam has been increased by the truculent behaviour of the former, who has twice in the last few months raided the flocks of the Bani Lam with the object either of making up arrears which he considers due to him, or of punishing those whom he suspects of attempting to evade payment of the tax. It is only with difficulty that the Bani Lam have been prevented from retaliating against these acts of aggression. The possibility of avoiding such disputes for the future and of saving the amour propre of the Bani Lam by making a fixed annual payment to the Wali through the 'Iraq Government in return for free grazing rights in the Pusht-i-Kuh is now under consideration, and negotiations with this object in view have been opened with the Wali.

There can be little doubt that the Wali of Pusht-i-Kuh is anxious to take advantage of any weakness on the part of the 'Iraq Government to improve his own position at its expense. One of his methods, for example, has been to purchase, generally through an agent, estates contiguous to his own territory, but on the 'Iraq side of the frontier. The local Qaimmaqam has, however, refused his application for title deeds confirming these transactions, and the Wali has requested me to intervene on his behalf. I have referred the whole question to the Council of Ministers, pointing out the complications likely to arise if neighbouring potentates are permitted to own large estates in 'Iraq contiguous to territory which they control in an official capacity. The Council is inquiring fully into the Wali's claims, and I do not anticipate that its decision will be in his favour.

NEAR EAST BOOKSHELF.

NEW LIGHT ON OLD PROBLEMS.

"THE OLDEST LETTERS IN THE WORLD TELL US—WHAT?" By Mrs. Sydney Bristowe. (London: George Allen and Unwin, Ltd. 5s. net.)

Let it be said at the outset that we sincerely hope that Mrs. Sydney Bristowe is quite right. If we do not venture to say that we think she is, it is only because the opinion of anyone who cannot study the records at first-hand necessarily lacks weight. Mrs. Bristowe herself, it may be inferred, has to be content with translations of the Amarna Tablets, and to this extent is at some disadvantage, even when she is sure enough of her ground to hold that So-and-so's translations "are the most convincing, chiefly because they are more colloquial than others." But the advantage that our author has is that she has brought to bear on the study of her subject not only a full knowledge of the Bible, but also a very strong conviction in its inspiration, and a resolve that where its evidence clashes with other records a way must be found to refute the latter. Therefore, both for what she sets out to prove and for the means on which she relies to prove it, we may hope that, if archæology can throw further light upon the subject, it will be confirmatory and will not reveal the weak joints in her armour.

"The Oldest Letters in the World" are, of course, the Amarna Tablets, and, among the things of which they tell us is Joshua's conquest of Palestine, from the Egyptian and Canaanite point of view. They consist for the most part of letters from rulers of Palestine to Amenhotep IV. calling upon the Egyptian king for help against the invaders of their country, which was part of his dominions, and expressing dismay at his failure to protect his own territory. The key to Amenhotep's strange conduct is supplied by our author, who suggests that the heretic religion that he had adopted was none other than that of the Hebrews, and that in deliberately turning a deaf ear to his subjects' entreaties he was consciously helping the fulfilment of the prophecy that had promised Palestine to the Israelites. Could there possibly be a more attractive theory than that the Pharaoh of the Exodus and his immediate successors became followers of the God of the Hebrews, abolished the idolatry of Egypt, and for that reason incurred the hostility of the priests, who on coming into their own again undertook a systematic campaign of vilifying the "heretic kings" and of falsifying all the records of their reigns?

It has generally been accepted that, while Joshua was conquering South Palestine the Amorites were taking possession of Phœnicia. Mrs. Bristowe shows that the Land of the Amorites had been previously occupied and dwelt in by the Israelites, who then became identified with them, and were called Amorites by the Canaanites. It was thus the Israelites, and not the Canaanites—an inferior race, as they are termed in the Bible—who conquered Phœnicia and besieged Tyre. On this point, it so happens, the Amarna Tablets come to the help of the Bible, and Joshua's reputation as a military leader is vindicated in connection with his supposed failure to capture the chief city of the Phœnicians. Where the Bible makes him burn Hazor, we should read Tyre, Zor being the Hebrew name for Tyre, meaning rock, and Ha or Kha being the article. It follows, therefore, with Euclidian precision, that the Phœnicians of later times were Israelites, Asher and Dan constituting the seafaring tribes, and becoming those "enterprising mariners and dauntless colonisers" who came westwards to Britain. Hence, "at least as far as their Phœnician ancestors go, the British have rightfully inherited nearly all the promises made to Shem's descendants, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." Other points remain to be cleared up. Our author disposes of the great Hittite Empire—a conception that clashes with the easy conquest of the Biblical Hittites by the children of Israel—by merging it into the kingdom of Dusratta of Mittani, himself of Aramæan descent and closely akin to the Hebrews, the Aramæans being descendants of Shem, from whose son Aram they derived their name; while the Hebrews came from Eber, Shem's great-grandson. Dusratta, as we know, had a sister and a daughter married respectively to Amenhotep III. and Amenhotep IV., an additional factor perhaps in the religion of both. His empire, Mrs. Bristowe argues, was too great to allow room for another empire, the Hittite, at the same time in the same part of the world, and accordingly we have to fall back again on priestly falsifications. On this point, while the reader will be prepared to forgive Dusratta for his weakness for aliases and nicknames, he will grieve over the loss of such a picturesque personality as Subbiluliuma. To many his disappearance from the pages of history will come as a personal blow, which our author does nothing to soften in ending abruptly on a theory which would transfer the reader's affections from the sublime Subbiluliuma to the ridiculous Dusratta.

A TOUR IN POST-WAR EUROPE.

"A NEW WORLD THROUGH OLD EYES." By M. S. Ware. (London: G. P. Putnam. 9s. net.)

We are, as a nation, far too apt to assume that the inhabitants of the U.S.A. are as ourselves, and it is odd that this curious assumption should persist in spite of the constant reminders which they give us that nothing can be farther from the truth. This imposing volume by Mrs. Mary S. Ware is one of these reminders. What Englishwoman would think of giving to the world at large a collection of intimate private letters written to her "dear family" in the course of travel, and dealing quite as much with the private affairs of the said family and of new and old acquaintances met as with the affairs of the countries visited? But this is precisely what this gallant old lady of eighty has done. Her publishers announce the volume as "an account of her impressions of post-War Europe. In 1921 she visited twenty-one Continental countries, including the Balkans and the Near East, and in this volume she gives a vivid account which does justice to both the victors and the vanquished." The actual travels occupied eight or nine months, and the "vivid account" is mainly of how A. and B. were "perfectly lovely" to her, what splendid people C. and D. are, how E. is so much nicer than F., and so on, A., B., etc., being usually Americans met during her travels who are known to her "dear family." She keeps us informed that she is zealously pro-British, that she sticks up for the Jews, that she hates the Turks, and that America won the War. She gives snippets of conversations with various "interesting people" which are of no value. But she has a sense of humour, and the picture of the kind-hearted and indomitable old lady in places like Smyrna and Tirana which she unconsciously presents us with has its charm. Those who like to read the long chatty private letters of an "Aunt Mary" belonging to a family of which they know nothing will enjoy this book. Personally, we feel as if we had been reading letters not intended for our eye, and that our indiscretion has not resulted in any useful addition to our information.

What the authoress might have done if she had "scrapped" the letters and written a real book of countries which she knew before the War may be guessed by the delightful sixty pages of reminiscences of her own life which she prints at the end of the work. A charming old lady of strong personality she is, but her book is hardly likely to appeal to English readers.

LUXOR JUNK.

"JOSH JENNINGS AT LUXOR." By Capt. R. W. Campbell. (London: Nash and Grayson. 7s. 6d. net.)

A novel upon the recent discoveries at Luxor and the consequent visits to them was, one supposes, inevitable in these days when anything that can excusably bring in a "desert" and a harem is a paying proposition, but really there was no need for such sorry "junk" as this. Captain Campbell has merely collected a few types—the strong, lackadaisical British administrator, the hustling, enormously sentimental American, his equally sentimental daughter—of course, a first-rate shot—a few natives, some rascally, some faithful, and the necessary rest of the stock-in-trade. There is no story worth the retelling. A series of incidents, in which the author is enabled to convey the fineness of the British character and achievement in Africa, ends swiftly—if sufficient pages be skipped—in the American girl and somebody of the Camel Corps kissing each other "below the stars."

ORTHOPTERA IN MACEDONIA.

Contained in "The Transactions of the Entomological Society of London, 1923" (London: 41, Queen's Gate, 36s.), is an interesting and extremely instructive chapter called "A Contribution to our Knowledge of the Orthoptera of Macedonia," by Malcolm Burr, B. P. Campbell, and B. P. Uvarov. Practically all this particular knowledge amassed by Dr. Burr and Captain Campbell was gained during the War in the area of the British Army in Macedonia, especially in the district at the back of Salonika; and it will certainly entertain those of our soldiers who were either amused or pestered by the antics of certain local insects to find them here identified. It cannot, however, be supposed that the interest of this paper is other than technical and specific, though it is of none the less value on that account. And even those innocent of entomological zeal can easily read of the enthusiastic discoveries of these cheery "bug-hunters."

NOTES AND NEWS.

167, Strand, London,
Tuesday Morning.

The Regeneration of Austria.

If the League of Nations owing to a series of unfortunate circumstances has so far not promised to fulfil the high hopes based upon it, it has at any rate one outstanding achievement to its credit in the successful work it has carried out in the reconstruction of Austria. The financial rehabilitation of that country through the League was dealt with in a recent speech before the Assembly of the League by Sir Henry Strakosch, whose remarks on the subject merit general attention, for the problems that are well on the way to being solved in Austria are the problems of many other countries in Europe to-day, and the mistakes that were made in Austria are still being perpetrated elsewhere despite the dictums laid down at the now far-off Brussels Financial Conference.

The Essentials for Reconstruction.

Sir Henry declared that he conceived the lesson to be learnt from the Austrian achievement and its significance in relation to the general question of the restoration of Europe is broadly that it has afforded proof that, given an assurance of internal and external peace and ordered conditions, the internal economy of a country can be made to function satisfactorily even if that country has to go through a difficult process of adjusting itself to entirely new political conditions. He thought that the example of Austria should kill the fallacious notions as to the origin of currency depreciation, and the remedies to be applied to it, and in this connection he referred to the many and varied exchange regulations that still make their appearance. Sir Henry further explained the overwhelming importance of confidence as shown in the case of Austria. The Austrian experiment, he declared, has shown that while foreign credits are necessary, the really essential and fundamental part of reconstruction is the restoration of confidence. The success of the Austrian loan operations illustrates this point.

More Enterprise Required.

It would seem obvious that nothing but sustained enterprise in good and bad times alike will safeguard the interests of British trade, but it is unfortunately only too evident that many manufacturers have yet to learn this elementary truth. Because business is for a variety of reasons hard to obtain they have been showing an unwillingness to spend money on the various forms of publicity of which they are only too ready to avail themselves in normal times, not realising that in so doing they are simply giving an opening to astute trade rivals. There is nothing more certain than that the memory of buyers must constantly be assisted if they are to keep in mind a particular commodity. We had an instance in this country only recently of the results of the failure to carry on a consistent advertising campaign. The consequences of inadequate publicity in overseas markets are much more certain. It is not merely in markets where our traders have not obtained a sound footing, but where the future outlook is promising, that this shortcoming is in evidence. Even in a market so important—one might add so vitally essential—to this country as India firms have for some time been curtailing their expenditure on publicity. This is not economy in any sense of the term, and cannot be justified on any grounds, and I am afraid that this utterly mistaken policy, unless swiftly abandoned, may have very serious consequences for our trade.

Smyrna-Aidin Railway Position.

Although the report of the Ottoman railway from Smyrna to Aidin for the half-year ended June 30 (which is given in another column) only gives the accounts for the working of the railway up to December 31 last, the figures submitted indicate clearly the improvement in the situation. The entire system was in operation, and the gross earnings amounted to £217,706 as against £167,105. There was a profit on working of £60,975, and the company had a debit balance to reserve account at June 30 of £894,511, which is subject, of course, to the deduction of whatever profit may have been made during that half-year. Reference is made in the report to the agreement arrived at in June between Mr. Alwyn Parker and the Angora Government, under which the claims of the company for war losses should be settled by August 3, 1924. The Council of Administration express the hope that a settlement will be obtained before that date, so that they will have sufficient information to enable them at an early date to draw up plans regarding any rearrangement of the capital of the railway that may be considered necessary. For the experience of the company since 1914, and, in particular, since the Armistice, it would be difficult to find a parallel. It is now possible to hope that at long last the company will be able to devote its attention to the work of reconstruction and development. Given freedom from disturbances, the future of the line should be assured, for the region it serves is one of the most important in Turkey, and it should play no unimportant part in connection with the future development of the country.

COMMERCE AND FINANCE IN THE SUDAN.

The Report on the Finances, Administration, and Condition of the Sudan in 1922 is a document of special interest in view of the increasing importance that promises to attach to the Sudan in the scheme of British Imperial affairs. The following extracts are taken from various sections of the Report.

Finance.

General Situation.—Financial conditions in the Sudan during 1922 have been fairly satisfactory, though less so than was anticipated when the budget was framed, owing to world-wide depression in trade which was already felt in the Sudan in 1921, but appeared to take fuller effect in 1922. Conditions in Europe are still such as to give little encouragement for hopes of any immediate and general recovery. As regards the special conditions in the Sudan, the rains of 1921, though somewhat unevenly distributed, were generally good and the Nile flood high, so that with the surplus from previous years the country had ample stocks of dura and other agricultural produce. On the other hand, the steady fall in the prices of dura and cattle has, for the time being, substantially diminished the purchasing power of the population in general, and made it difficult in certain districts to collect taxes in cash. As a set-off against the reduction in the livestock trade, which has been very considerable, the year was favourable for gum; cotton showed a decrease both in quantity and value, and dura, a substantial increase in quantity and a slight increase in value. Sesame exports were up to the average, but substantially less both in quantity and value than for 1921. While the general trend of prices and the depression in trade were adversely affecting the purchasing power of the people as noted above, special circumstances, such as the suspension of work on the White Nile Dam by the Egyptian Government and the restriction of expenditure on the Gezira irrigation scheme by the Sudan Government, operated in the same direction. As a result, although the value of the exports for 1922, chiefly owing to the favourable gum figures and the good rains of 1921 referred to above, did not fall much below that of 1921, the value of imports has declined from £E. 5,806,000 in 1921 to £E. 4,252,890 in 1922.

Future Prospects.—The outlook for the immediate future is more encouraging. Good rains fell again in the autumn of 1922, while the resumption of work on the Gezira irrigation scheme under the contract placed in September with Messrs. S. Pearson and Co., and the commencement of the extension of the Sudan railway system to Kassala, may be expected to give a substantial impetus to trade.

The Budget for 1923.

In the Budget estimates for 1923 Revenue and Expenditure balanced at £E. 3,465,000, as compared with £E. 3,880,000, the figure in the 1922 Budget. The approximate final results for 1922 are given at: Revenue, £E. 3,484,500; Expenditure, £E. 3,482,834.

The estimated revenue and expenditure for 1923 is, therefore, less than that estimated in the budget for 1922 by £E. 415,000. As has been indicated above in dealing with the actual results for 1922, the fall in the anticipated revenue is almost entirely accounted for by reduced estimates for railway earnings. Although some revival in trade may be looked for in 1923, it has not been thought prudent to budget for any higher figures inasmuch as the Government is following the policy of reducing railway rates, where possible, in order to encourage traffic. As against this reduction in revenue it is hoped that expenditure may be considerably reduced owing to lower costs. On the item of coal, for example, it has been possible to reduce the provision from £E. 370,000 made in the budget for 1922 to £E. 175,000 for 1923. In addition to reductions in expenditure on allowances and services due to lower prices such as noted above, the most rigid economy has been exercised in framing the budget for 1923. Existing appointments involving an expenditure of about £E. 73,000 have been suppressed. Further, the temporary gratuity on account of high cost of living, which was reduced in 1922, has been further cut down for 1923 from 25 per cent. to 15 per cent. in the case of officials' salaries, and from 40 per cent. to 20 per cent. in the case of pensioners. This has resulted in a reduction of £E. 180,636 in respect of this service, i.e., from £E. 367,636 to £E. 187,000. As against the main reasons necessitating these and future economies, the following special factors affecting the financial situation must be noted:—

(a) The Government is faced with a steadily increasing expenditure in respect of personnel and pensions, due to the automatic increases in rates of salaries, and to the normal increase in the number of those in receipt of pensions. The present administration has not been in existence long enough for the "peak figure" to have been reached yet under either heading. The Government is now carefully examining its future liabilities in respect of these items.

(b) Another factor which will prejudicially affect the revenue in future years is that the Egyptian Government has decided to withdraw the contribution of £E. 23,000 per annum, which it previously made to the repression of slave trade in the Sudan.

(c) Apart from the above—and this must be the main pre-occupation of the Government for the next few years—provision must be made against its liabilities in respect of the loans issued for the Gezira irrigation scheme. Interest on the loans may very possibly exceed revenue from the scheme during the first years, and it is essential to build up a cash reserve against this contingency. The search for economies is therefore being vigorously continued. It is in this direction rather than in any increase of taxation that the Government must look for improving its financial position.

Subject to this the future is full of hopes. A special effort is needed to prepare for meeting the special strain of the next few years. Once this has been taken up and the schemes in respect of which the expenditure has been undertaken are bearing fruit a new era of expansion and prosperity should open up for the country.

Bank of Athens.—Interim dividend for the current year of five drachmae on the ordinary shares (coupon No. 45), free of all Greek taxes, payable at the current rate of exchange on September 12. After the distribution there remains a balance of 9,914,140 drachmae to the credit of the profit and loss account, which the directors have decided to carry forward to the second half-year of 1923. The dividend a year ago was the same, and 9,528,867 drachmae was carried forward.

LIFE-SAVING APPLIANCES ON LINERS.

One of the most interesting papers read at Olympia in connection with the Shipping Exhibition was one on "Life-Saving Appliances on Large Passenger Vessels," by Mr. Ernest W. Blocksidge, M.I.N.A. In view of the absorbing interest that the subject has for all who go down to the sea in ships, we reproduce here a summary of Mr. Blocksidge's address :—

During a period of seventy years legislation dealing with the equipment of large passenger vessels with life-saving appliances had been of a gradual character. The Titanic disaster led to panic regulations in 1914, and the application of these had become a question of increasing importance to the shipowner and of extreme difficulty to the naval architect. The experience gained under the present rule of a seat in a lifeboat for every person on board, said Mr. Blocksidge, makes it very doubtful whether this modern legislation has been effectual to any appreciable degree. In the light of accumulated evidence from recent casualties at sea, even the most ardent advocates of the "boats for all" policy must admit that in the event of sudden emergency, the accommodation provided in the lifeboats and the apparatus installed for launching them overboard cannot possibly be used to their fullest extent.

It is generally agreed that the comprehensive investigations made by the various committees appointed by the Board of Trade during the past ten years have, on the one hand, increased the efficiency of the details of the life-saving equipment on board cargo and passenger vessels; but, on the other hand, the constant changes created by new regulations have an unsettling effect on the shipbuilding industry, and unless the rules which aim at securing a higher standard for safety of life at sea receive international acceptance, British shipowners are placed at a disadvantage in foreign competition.

The Launching Problem.

The types and sizes of vessels vary, and may affect the general question of stowage of the life-saving appliances, but there is one feature of the subject which is applicable to all, and that is the question of the time required after casualty to abandon ship. It is very readily observed from investigations into the details of casualties to passenger vessels at sea that the number of lives saved is governed by the limit of time available for the operation of transferring the persons from the vessel to the lifeboats, and lowering them from the launching apparatus or davits to the water. The efficiency of any system of "boat stowage" depends mainly on the number of lifeboats which can be stowed under and attached to davits at the ship's sides, and are available for launching overboard immediately the necessity arises. Boats "stacked" in numbers on the deck of a vessel give the passenger a false sense of security. Even if means are provided for transporting the inboard boats to the ship's sides by the use of a duplicated system of davits, rails, or carriages, it is evident that a reasonable time limit would not permit of these lifeboats being loaded and launched overboard in an emergency. Under these conditions—which are not uncommon in large passenger vessels—the demand for "boats for all" not only becomes a fallacy, but is a positive danger to the passenger. The important feature to keep in view in designing a satisfactory boat stowage is not so much the number of boats that can be carried as the number of launching or embarking stations which can be utilised within a reasonable limit of time. From the available information in the possession of the Merchant Shipping Advisory Committee and the Marine Department of the Board of Trade, it is considered that all foreign-going passenger vessels should be installed with life-saving appliances in such a manner as to enable all the apparatus to be safely launched within a time limit of thirty minutes from the moment the captain of a vessel gives his order to launch the lifeboats.

Life-Rafts.

It has now been fully realised that the limit of time available for launching the life-saving equipment is such that special consideration should be given to the question of providing a light type of apparatus which is easily transferred to the water, and will give temporary support to persons in the water until the arrival of assistance. The present regulations controlling the equipment of vessels with life-saving appliances permit the use of buoyant apparatus only in the case of home-trade vessels which carry a number of passengers in excess of the accommodation provided in the statutory number of lifeboats laid down by the rules. Life-saving apparatus for these additional passengers is then made up by the provision of light buoyant apparatus or buoyant deck-seats. The Board of Trade in December, 1919, obtained a very important expression of opinion from shipmasters representing the leading shipping lines in this country as to their experience of the relative value of boats and rafts, and the replies indicated a general desire for a suitable combination of both to be installed on passenger vessels. It was the considered opinion of the sub-committee on buoyant apparatus, expressed in the recent report of the Merchant Shipping Advisory Committee, that the conditions imposed by the present rules for the construction of liferafts are incompatible. Rafts of sufficient strength to be thrown from the vessel's deck, and strong enough to carry persons out of the water rather than supporting them in the water, could not, in their opinion, be handled without mechanical appliances. Under the conditions which generally obtain in an emergency it was considered that the heavy type of raft as at present approved by the Board of Trade would be a source of danger rather than one of safety. The apparatus recommended by the committee is that which can be easily handled and thrown, if necessary, from the deck to the water. Sufficient buoyancy should be provided to enable a weight of 32 lbs. to be supported in the water for each person the apparatus is certified to carry. The quality of handiness was considered to be of the greatest importance, and should not be sacrificed in pursuit of other advantages. The practical advantages of the light form of liferaft are that it can be easily stowed for immediate use when the limit of time is not sufficient to enable all the boats under davits being launched successfully, and should a vessel take a heavy list after casualty the light form of raft or buoyant apparatus can be used from either side of the ship.

The Committee's Recommendations.

The Merchant Shipping Advisory Committee has now formulated definite recommendations for adoption by the Board of Trade, whereby all foreign-going passenger vessels should be equipped with

THE REVIVAL OF TRADE WITH RUSSIA?

In view of the fact that there can never be a complete return to normal trade conditions in the world until Russia takes her proper place once more in the economic scheme of things, any sign of improvement in the financial and commercial conditions of that country will be watched with close interest. Certainly the rehabilitation of South Russia will play an important part in the reconstruction of the Near and Middle East. In this connection, therefore, attention may here be called to the following passage in a report recently issued by Messrs. Samuel Montagu and Co. :—

News of an encouraging nature has been received as to the installation and working of the new currency system in Russia, based upon a unit called the chervonetz, by which a measure of stability is expected to be attained that will enable values to be fixed sufficiently for import and export trade to be transacted with some degree of ease. A party of business men representing important firms here has lately returned from visiting that country and investigating the prospects of trade. One member, Mr. F. L. Baldwin, thus comments upon what they observed. It will be noted that his remarks imply the fundamental truth that no currency stability can be achieved without taxation adequate to the needs of a country's budget :—

"The thing that struck us all most, without exception, was the extraordinary ability with which they are struggling with the financial situation. Their policy, as explained to us by members of the Government, is to make their Budget balance, to stabilise their currency, and to preserve a favourable trade balance. They are cutting down their expenditure very heavily and pushing up their taxes. In fact, they fear they have put their taxes up too high, and that they may have to bring them down again. Income-tax ranges from 2½ per cent. to 20 per cent., and they have placed a tax of about 3 per cent. on the turnover of the business community, which seems to be the equivalent of our corporation profits tax. It is Krassin's job to see that they keep a favourable trade balance and that their imports on no account exceed their exports. They are trying to establish their currency on a chervonetz basis. A chervonetz is the equivalent of our pound. They are backing the new currency by gold or gold securities up to 25 per cent., and by other securities, such as short-term bills, for the remainder. The law is that no more of these chervonetz shall be issued than can be backed in this way. We were told, and I have no reason to doubt it, that this new currency represents about two-thirds of their total currency. While we were there the value of the rouble was falling all the time as against the chervonetz. It was a constant remark among us that we only wished the Germans were handling their currency problem as well."

Anglo-Egyptian Oil Output.—Week ended September 14: Gemsah, 11 tons (previous week, 8 tons); Hurghada, 2,155 tons (against 2,290 tons).

The P. and O. Company, it is understood, have placed an order with Messrs. Barclay, Curle, and Co. for the construction of two liners, each of 15,000 tons deadweight. The builders are also to supply the engines, which are to be of 11,000 horse-power.

The British Overseas Bank, Ltd., announces that funds for the payment of the coupon October 1, 1923, on the English, French, and American series of the Roumanian Four per Cent. Consolidation Loan, 1922, have been lodged with them by the Roumanian Government.

light rafts or buoyant apparatus to the extent of 25 per cent. of the total number of persons on board. This apparatus is therefore in addition to the present equipment of lifeboat accommodation for all persons on board. It is this additional provision, continued Mr. Blocksidge, which will probably give cause for much discussion among shipowners. The heavy type of liferaft must now be considered as an apparatus which can only be carried on a passenger vessel in such a position that it is clear of the stowage of the boats under davits, and will "float off" the vessel, forming part of the statutory equipment required to make up the full accommodation for passengers which cannot be obtained in the lifeboats under davits at the ship's sides. Recommendations have also been made by the Advisory Committee giving permission for Class 2 lifeboats to be used as the second boat under davits, or to form part of the equipment—as the heavy liferaft—which is to be stowed across the poop or boat deck, making up the additional accommodation not secured in boats at the ship's sides for all persons on board. In this connection may I make an appeal that, when considering the revision of the present rules, the pontoon lifeboat of Classes 1C, 2C, and 2B should not be permitted to form part of the statutory equipment for a passenger vessel unless the hull is fitted with steel water-tight compartments or metal buoyancy air-cases when the lifeboat is constructed of wood. A number of passenger vessels are at present fitted with a type of lifeboat which is dependent for its reserve buoyancy on a system of double wooden planking, and which experience has proved to be useless for the purpose intended.

It is assumed that 100 per cent. represents the efficiency of the equipment when all the lifeboats on board can be successfully launched overboard into the water within a time limit of 30 minutes, and that, with the addition of the proposed 25 per cent. of light buoyant apparatus, the effective value is increased to 125 per cent. In one or two instances large passenger vessels have rearranged their boat stowage so as to carry the full number of lifeboats under davits at the ship's sides. This can be done with boats in double tier or by a system of nesting. Placing one lifeboat inside another keeps down the centre of gravity of top weight, and provides a considerable saving in deck space, but when compared with the ordinary double-tier stowage this system possesses a serious disadvantage, owing to the smaller boat of the two being launched into the water first, thus limiting the available accommodation required in an emergency.

I venture to state that the records of all casualties to vessels at sea show the necessity for immediate action to be taken to supply light rafts to all passenger vessels, and they also prove the statement that it is far more important to secure a system of double-tier boat stowage, together with the assistance of buoyant apparatus which can be launched effectively within a reasonable limit of time, than to rely on the necessity of a crowded boat deck with inboard stowage in order to provide full accommodation for all persons on board, and which cannot be launched within a time limit of 30 minutes. Overcrowding the boat stowage of passenger vessels as a direct result of the present regulations has not increased the efficiency of life-saving equipment when compared with the requirements in operation at the time of the Titanic disaster, if our judgment is to be based on the results from casualties to passenger vessels since the year 1912.

Mr. Blocksidge's Conclusions.

Mr. Blocksidge pointed out that the most efficient mechanism for operating life-saving appliances would be ineffective unless the crew are constantly trained to handle the equipment in an emergency and instructed how to control the passengers. He attached importance to the installation of a system of emergency lighting, arranged to give facility to the boats' crews operating the launching apparatus. Among the conclusions that he submitted for consideration were the following:—

1. The construction of the vessel should be such that the internal arrangement of bulkheads dividing the ship into watertight compartments will secure such reserve of buoyancy as will enable the vessel to remain afloat for a reasonable time after casualty, and thus ensure that, with proper arrangements, all the life-saving equipment can be launched into the water.

2. All passenger vessels should have a system of radio-telegraphy and telephony installed.

3. When it becomes necessary to abandon ship after casualty, the first line of defence should be heavy seagoing lifeboats—but not too heavy to be conveniently man-handled by the boat's crew—stowed under or attached to davits at the ship's sides.

Accommodation should be provided in these lifeboats for all persons on board, or for the greatest number which the length of the vessel will permit to be carried in lifeboats stowed in double tier at the ship's sides.

4. Light buoyant apparatus in excess of the accommodation in lifeboats should be provided to the extent of 25 per cent. of the total number of persons carried on board. This buoyant apparatus should be such as to be man-handled easily and thrown from the deck to the water on either side of the vessel, and should be stowed so as to be always available in emergency.

In order to maintain a reasonable standard for safety of life at sea, would it not be advisable to limit the number of persons to that which can be accommodated in lifeboats under davits at the ship's sides or make up the shortage with buoyant apparatus with an addition of 25 per cent. of the total complement in every case?

6. The important feature associated with boat stowage is to provide the greatest number of embarking stations the length of the vessel will admit, rather than to confine the transport of passengers, when abandoning ship, to a small number of such stations.

7. That among the lifeboats should be one or more motor-boats, installed with wireless telegraphy and equipped with small searchlights.

PHŒNIX OIL AND TRANSPORT CO.

The progress report of the Phœnix Oil and Transport Co., Ltd., and allied companies for August shows that the total crude oil production was 11,047 tons and the throughput of the refinery 7,744 tons. The corresponding figures for July were 7,712 tons and 5,305 tons respectively.

The report states that well No. 6 Moreni and Orion well No. 550 were brought into production on August 10. The latter was, unfortunately, subsequently shut down owing to a fire occurring, but the necessary repairs have now been made.

COMPANY NOTES AND REPORTS.

Smyrna-Aidin Railway.

The report of the Council of Administration of the Ottoman Railway from Smyrna to Aidin states that the accounts now presented are for the half-year to June 30 last, but they only include those from Smyrna up to December 31, 1922, it having been found impossible to prepare later accounts for inclusion, owing to the vast amount of work entailed in putting matters in order after the chaos occasioned by the war and the subsequent difficulty experienced in obtaining permits for the return of the staff.

At the request of the Turkish authorities, the company's representative, Mr. Alwyn Parker, C.B., C.M.G., proceeded to Angora in June last, and was able, after long negotiations with the Angora Government, to conclude an agreement whereby the accounts in connection with the seizure and working of the railway by the Turkish Government from December 1, 1914, up to February, 1919, and all the claims of the company for losses incurred during that period, will be examined by experts of the two parties, and, if necessary, submitted to arbitration. The examination of accounts and claims must be concluded by January 3, 1924, and should agreement not have been reached by February 3, 1924, the matter will then go before arbitrators, and it is stipulated that these latter shall have a period of three months to arrive at a decision. Should further disagreement ensue the matter will be entrusted to an umpire for final decision within a further period of three months. Thus these matters should be settled by August 3, 1924, at latest, but the Council are hopeful it may be possible to arrive at an agreement before that date, so that delay in obtaining definite information regarding the nature and method of compensation likely to be forthcoming may be obviated and the council placed in possession of sufficient information to enable them to formulate plans at an early date respecting any rearrangement of the company's capital that may be considered necessary.

The Council states that a considerable portion of the amount still owed to the company by the Greek Government in respect of traffic accounts, etc., still remains unpaid, despite the repeated demands that have been made and the constant and urgent representations that have been made to His Majesty's Foreign Office.

As regards the damage done to the company's property by the Greek military forces during their period of occupation, the Treaty of Peace recently concluded provides that the Greek Government shall pay compensation for losses and damage resulting from the acts of Greek armies or administrative authorities after June 1, 1921, other than losses and damage due to acts of war in the zone of active military operations. The payment of such damage and losses is to be effected by means of annuities spread over a period of forty years. A statement is being prepared setting forth the company's claims in this respect, and this will be submitted in due course to the proper authorities. It should be noted that the company's property was severely damaged during the Greek military operations prior to June, 1921, and it is not clear to the Council why, under the Treaty, claims against Greece are confined to the period subsequent to that date, or why damage and losses due to acts of war in the zone of active military operations are excluded. On these grounds, and on account of the very serious losses suffered by the company during the Great War, the Council have strongly pressed the Foreign Office to use their influence in order that the company, whose stockholders so largely consist of British subjects, may be allowed to participate in the sterling fund available for the benefit of Allied subjects.

The Council are glad to be able to state that now, following on Mr. Parker's negotiations at Angora, certain of the officials of the company have returned to Smyrna and are settling down to their duties under the difficult conditions imposed by the devastation and ruin that exists in Smyrna and in the districts along the railway. As foreshadowed in the last half-yearly report, meetings of the share and debenture holders were held in June last, at which resolutions were passed deferring the payment of interest on the 4 per cent. and 5 per cent. debenture stocks until twelve months after the half-yearly due date which shall first occur after the ratification of the Treaty of Peace between Great Britain and Turkey. The rebuilding of the important Meander Bridge at Seraikeuy is proceeding, and all the necessary material has now been shipped from this country. Major R. E. T. Money-Shewan, till lately deputy general manager, has been appointed general manager as from July 1 last. The net revenue account shows a debit balance at June 30 last (excluding profit on working for the half-year) of £894,510.

The report of the general manager gives the approximate gross earnings as £217,706, as compared with £167,105 in the corresponding period of 1922. Of this about £52,000, or nearly 25 per cent. of the whole, represents military traffic, for which no payment has been received. The total outstandings on Turkish military remaining unpaid now approximate £83,000. The earnings from coaching traffic show an increase of 51 per cent. and from goods traffic of 33 per cent. over the first half of 1922. Working expenses totalled £124,433, against £121,142, and formed 57.16 per cent. of the gross earnings. The chief increase was on locomotive expenses, owing to the larger quantity of coal consumed.

Tata Iron and Steel.

A cable from the Tata Iron and Steel Co. in Bombay states that the accounts for the year to March 30 last show a profit of approximately Rs.22,00,000, after deducting interest on debentures and loans and including Rs.1,44,702 brought in. For the period of nine months to March 31, 1922, there was a profit of Rs.39,37,572. It is further stated that the company has recovered from the effects of the strike, production for the first three months of the present year being much in excess of that for the first quarter of last year. Pig-iron output was 95,750 tons, against 67,769 tons, and of finished steel 36,274 tons against 31,470 tons. In addition, the Government of India has agreed to a revision of the price for steel rails, which will give an increase of Rs.25 per ton over the contract figure.

Suez Oil Co.

The directors of the Suez Oil Co. announce that they are now in negotiation for the acquisition of an important interest in the Consolidated Oilfields of India, in addition to securing drilling rights over a portion of that company's oil concession in the Kundal oilfield of India. In the event of those negotiations being satisfactorily concluded, full information, together with reports, etc., will be sent to shareholders.

Cotton and Cotton Goods.

THE EGYPTIAN MARKET.

Futures Firm and Active.

The Alexandria Commercial Company, in their report for the week ended September 7, state :—

Since our last report the futures market has been rather firm and very active. The low American Bureau condition for August has stimulated the activity witnessed these last two weeks, and has induced confidence in the market. The arrivals from up-country are as yet too small to have any effect on the market. An American crop of about 10,788,000 bales is forecasted; if it should turn out to be so small it would be a most serious matter and bound to draw spinners' attention to other growths, and more especially to Egyptians. The demand from abroad has this week been very much more active than has been the case for a long time. Reports from the leading textile centres are more encouraging, but unfortunately the terrible catastrophe which has befallen Japan must impede all commerce there, and their takings of cotton may be substantially reduced during the coming season. The difference between Sakellaridis and Ashmouni has further narrowed owing to speculative straddles, and the tendency is for a still further narrowing. The Government have not committed themselves to any purchases during the week, and we do not think that they will intervene any further, as conditions have now changed and the market is quite capable of supporting itself. This week's receipts amount to 50,552 krs., against exports 51,895 krs.; the stock stands at 818,275 krs.

Spot.—Minet-el-Bassal has been more active this week, and a better demand from abroad has been experienced. Sales amount to about 9,500 B/s, of which we estimate 5,300 B/s Sakellaridis and 4,200 B/s Uppers. Uppers are now coming down in considerable quantities, and the first lots of Sakellaridis will be here next week, but there will be no real movement in Sakellaridis till next month. From the cotton we have seen, we venture to think that the quality of this year's Upper Egypt cotton will be quite good.

Sakellaridis.—All styles have been dealt in, with medium qualities predominating, and the low grades in poor request. Good grade really extra staple cotton is at present very hard to find. Prices for spot against contracts are without much change.

Uppers.—Most of the demand has been for good qualities, but all styles have been dealt in. The spot parities for high grades are considerably easier, and for the lower grades are somewhat cheaper than last week. Under the pressure of new crop arrivals the prices of the good grades look quite reasonable at present.

Brown and White are neglected, and nothing has been done. Quotations of spot are nominal and considerably easier than last week.

The crop conditions continue to be fairly favourable. In Lower Egypt a delay in the maturity of about 10 to 15 days is apparent in many districts, but it is not expected to have any serious consequences. Complaints of pink boll worm are not very serious.

The report of the Alexandria General Produce Association for August reads :—

Lower Egypt.—The rather favourable temperature which prevailed during August has helped the ripening of the bolls of the first picking and the satisfactory development of those of the second picking. There has been some fresh damage by pink-worm and boll-worm; the proportion of bolls attacked varies from 10 to 20 per cent., according to districts. Sakellaridis seems to have suffered rather more than other varieties. There have been a few slight fogs, but they have done practically no damage. In spite of the superabundance of water, watering generally has been done on a normal scale. The first picking has commenced in a few early fields, and will become general towards the 10th of the month for varieties other than Sakellaridis, and for this latter variety towards the 25th about ten days later than last year. Present prospects are fairly satisfactory.

Upper Egypt and Fayoum.—Temperature was rather cool during August; nevertheless, the plant has made good progress. Unimportant damage by pink and boll worm has been reported. First picking has commenced and will become general in a few days. Prospects are good.

The report of the Ministry of Agriculture for August states :—The weather was favourable during the month under review, and the water supply was ample. A certain amount of boll shedding due to overwatering is reported. Bolls are opening in early sown fields almost everywhere. Picking is already taking place in basin lands of Upper Egypt. In other places it is expected to begin towards the middle of September. Boll worm attacks seem to be no worse than last year. Slight attacks of aphis and wilt have been reported from most provinces. The general condition of the crop is the same as last month.

LIVERPOOL REPORT.

A Marked Improvement.

Messrs. Reynolds and Gibson, of Liverpool, report as follows for the week ending September 12 :—

Egyptian Futures.—The past week has shown a great improvement in the Egyptian futures market, prices advancing over a penny since our last report. Owing to the large orders which have lately appeared, trading has naturally been much facilitated with the easing of the political crisis between Italy and Greece, and the more reassuring reports that have been received concerning the disaster in Japan. The "bullish" sentiments aroused by the recent Bureau report were allowed full scope, and buying orders flowed in freely from all parts, the Continent especially being to the fore on any sign of a setback. The Alexandria market has shown great strength, speculators operating freely on rumours of American buying. The Upper (October) has particularly felt the pressure, and since last week has narrowed 100 points with the Sakel (November) contract.

In spite of the substantial advance we have recorded, the Egyptian market has not kept pace with the American, and as we write the straddle difference has narrowed 30 points on the week, the chief cause of this being some heavy Continental, and straddle selling against American, of distant positions, which has made its appearance during the last two days.

Contrary to what is generally expected after such a rapid rise as we have recently experienced, there has been no violent reaction up to date. As we write, the market shows signs of easing off slightly, but trade reports continue to be good, and the crop estimate in America shows an inclination to shrink still further. At the moment, we see no inducement to lean towards the "Bear" side.

Egyptian Spot.—A sudden wave of "bullish" sentiment has swept over the whole cotton world since our last report was published. The uncertainty caused by the foreign political crisis and the Japanese earthquake disaster has been largely removed, and the effect in America seems to have been like the removing of a safety valve. All markets have followed, to a greater or lesser degree, the lead given by New York, and in Alexandria rumours that the U.S.A. had commenced to purchase Uppers caused some wild speculation there. In Liverpool, spot prices advanced with great rapidity, the suddenness of the rise finding many spinners totally unprepared and causing quite a scramble for certain classes of cotton by those caught short. It has been practically impossible this week to buy F.G.F. Sakellaridis at anything under 100 on November contracts, and the lower grades apparently do not exist here. Uppers have been in very keen request, and the market has literally been swept bare. There are a few lots still to be obtained, but the lowest price asked to-day was 18·00d. (or 100 on November contracts) and in some cases the absurd price of "250 on" was quoted! A very fair enquiry continues for low cottons from about 7d. to 12d., and more business has lately taken place in these varieties.

The demand for the better grades of Sakellaridis, which recently had shown improvement, has received a setback, owing to the high prices now asked. Tokar Sakellaridis is also temporarily out of the picture for the same reason, but in the better known, and more widely used, Sudan Sakellaridis a fair business has taken place, holders being willing, apparently, to meet the demand, and so liquidate some of their rather heavy stocks before the market becomes flooded with new crop Sakellaridis.

Trade reports from Manchester have maintained a good tone, and the scarcity of the bread-and-butter varieties on the spot in Liverpool has produced more c.i.f business than we have witnessed for some time. Prompt and early October shipment have chiefly been asked for.

On the whole, the rise has had the effect of rather checking spot business for the moment, but it has certainly brought home the position of cotton to many who previously were regarding the situation through dimmed spectacles. A significant feature is that so far no serious reaction has occurred, although this evening, certainly, there does appear to be a tendency for prices to ease somewhat.

Forwardings to spinners for week ending 7th inst., 6,684 bales.

Total sales, 2,800 bales, and 1,500 bales Sudan.

Quotations of Sakel are raised 115 points for Fair to F.G.F.; 105 points for Good and Fine, and 80 points for Extra Fine. Brown and Uppers are 75 points higher on the week.

Fully Good Fair Sakellaridis to-day 17·95d., as compared with 16·80d. last Wednesday.

COTTON TRADE REVIEW.

A Considerable Improvement.

The Manchester Cotton Trade Review of the Imperial Ottoman Bank for the week ended September 15 states:—

The better tone mentioned last week has continued, and in fact has strengthened. The effects of the shortage of supplies in overseas markets appears at last to be felt, and it is hoped that buyers are abandoning the waiting policy which has for so long characterised their attitude. More actual business has been done and prices are better, although perhaps in most cases not yet remunerative on the basis of to-day's raw cotton values. For goods manufactured during the past two or three weeks sellers can of course accept prices which look cheap, and it remains to be seen whether the present movement will continue when supplies of this character are no longer available.

Yarn.—There has been greater activity in this section than for a long time past, and buying seems to have been of a general character. Stocks on hand have thus been reduced, and a more hopeful feeling exists. Both for Egyptian and American yarn demand has been fairly strong, and prices are harder, though probably not fully reflecting the rise in the staple. Shipments for the month of August amounted to 12,802,800 lb., as compared with 9,514,400 lb. in July and 15,408,500 lb. in August last year.

Cloth.—A more general inquiry has been experienced, and, in spite of the increased prices which are now being asked, more business has been booked. India has been prominent as a buyer of fancies, and China is reported to have placed some acceptable orders. Egypt and South America are mentioned in connection with standard lines. Shipments last month amounted to 329,945,600 sq. yds., against 316,083,600 sq. yds. in the previous month and 377,985,000 sq. yds. in August last year.

Raw Cotton.—Prices have risen 117 points on the week and closed steady. "Spot" sales have been larger than for a considerable time past. The stocks of American cotton held in Liverpool are exceedingly small, and any active demand for immediate delivery is quickly reflected in quotations. Closing prices are as follows:—American Fully Middling, 17.39; Egyptian Fully Good Fair, 17.95.

TENDERS INVITED, ETC.

Tenders are invited for the following contracts, and must be made by the dates mentioned.

(Particulars of tenders marked D.O.T. are to be obtained from the Department of Overseas Trade, 35, Old Queen Street, S.W.).

Bulgaria.

H.M. Legation at Sofia reports that the Bulgarian State Railways are desirous of receiving tenders for the supply of 500 tons of creosote to the approximate value of 3,500,000 leva. A public adjudication of tenders will be held on September 28.

Applications from British firms for further particulars should be addressed to the Department of Overseas Trade, 35, Old Queen Street, London, S.W.1. (Reference D.O.T. 11456/F.E./C.C./2.)

BRITISH CATALOGUES FOR TURKEY.

The Commercial Secretary at Constantinople reports that on the forthcoming transfer of the Commercial Secretariat to the Consular Residence, there will be increased accommodation and facilities for the display of British trade catalogues. Firms desiring to have their catalogues or other literature displayed at the Consular Residence should forward them, postage fully paid, to "The Commercial Secretary, British Consular Residence, Galata, Constantinople." The Commercial Secretary adds that many of the trade directories and reference books in his office are now out of date, and that he would be glad to receive current issues from those firms who make a practice of distributing complimentary copies of their publications.

BULGARIAN LOAN COUPON PAYMENT.

The Bulgarian Government is prepared to pay to British bondholders Coupon No. 42 of the Five per Cent. Gold Loan of 1902 maturing on September 14, 1923, at francs (French) 12.50 each, and the bonds drawn for redemption on that date at francs (French) 500 each.

Holders of bonds which have been in British ownership since August 1, 1914, who are desirous of availing themselves of the offer thus made by the Bulgarian Government, should present the above-mentioned coupons and drawn bonds (to which all coupons due after the date of redemption must remain attached) for payment at the counting house of Messrs. Stern Brothers, 6, Angel Court, E.C.2. The amount due in French francs will be paid in sterling at the sight rate of exchange on Paris on the day of presentation, less tax.

COMMERCIAL BREVITIES.

The strike on the Ottoman-Aidin Railway has been settled.

Messrs. Sanderson and Co. estimate the 1923 Northern Indian tea crop at 307,000,000 lbs.

A Central Hebrew Farmers' Union is to be established in Palestine, with headquarters in Petach Tikvah.

The Bank of England is prepared to receive the coupons due October 1 on bonds of the Greek Guaranteed Two and a-Half per Cent. Gold Loan of 1898.

No damage was done to the property of the Calcutta Tramways Company by the earthquake disturbance which occurred in Calcutta on September 10.

The Anglo-Afghan Trade Convention, which was signed in Kabul on June 5, has been ratified, and consequently entered into force with effect from August 4.

By the delivery to Yugoslavia of three thousand horses, 1,468 head of cattle, and five thousand sheep, Hungary has now fulfilled its obligations under the Treaty of Trianon.

The Ottoman Public Debt Administration of Palestine has wound up its affairs as a separate administration, and will now be taken over by the Department of Customs and Ports.

Speaking at Nijni Novgorod Fair, the chairman of the Persian Trade Bureau, Jafar Khan, having eulogised the Soviet diplomatist Shumiatsky, is reported to have said: "We know which are our friends and which are our foes in Persia. To the British we say, 'Leave us alone.'"

The Yugoslav Minister of Finance, it is announced, in order to insure the proper collection of taxes, and in view of the fluctuations to which the dinar is subject in relation to foreign currencies, has fixed the following rates, among others, for the conversion into dinars of accounts in gold or foreign currencies to remain in force until December 30, 1923: £1, 410 dinars; $1, 90 dinars; £T.1, 378 dinars; a gold 20-franc piece, 335 dinars.

THE SMYRNA SULTANA MARKET.

Messrs. C. J. Giraud and Co., of Smyrna, report as follows for the week ending September 1:—

The estimated arrivals on the Smyrna market since the opening of the season are put at 3,820 tons, as compared with 4,755 tons for the corresponding period in 1922. Sales to date are estimated at 2,720 tons, as compared with 3,655 tons at this time last year. Total shipments to the United Kingdom to date are 1,305 (1,610) tons, to the Continent 180 (1,500) tons, and to the U.S.A., Canada, and elsewhere 275 (140) tons, the figures in brackets being the corresponding totals last year.

Market Conditions.—The collapse in exchange to round about 760 pts. per £ sterling on Monday from the level of 880 in the early part of the previous week affected the volume of business. Purchases in the early part of the week were on a reduced scale, and prices in local currency marked some decline, which, however, did not counterbalance the advance to the extent that adverse exchanges affected quotations in foreign currencies. Towards the close of the week exchanges improved and, with the concessions made by sellers in local currency, quotations on balance showed a net decline of about 2s. per cwt. from previous week's closing level. The undertone on the market inclines to firmness, and yet conditions are very uncertain, owing to the political horizon being once more obscured by Greco-Italian differences.

Labour unrest is also becoming an acute question. A strike on the Aidin Railway was declared at midnight of August 31, resulting in a complete cessation in all arrivals of fruit from that district. The fig districts are exclusively tapped by the Aidin Railway, and no arrivals have reached market since August 30. For want of figs, packers have been obliged to close down their packing establishments. No agreement has yet been reached between the strikers and the railway authorities, although negotiations for a settlement are being carried on. Strikes are pending in all industrial lines. Ultimatums conveying the labourers' terms expire to-night.

A close study of the course of sultana shipments will be instructive to both U.K. and Continental merchants. They are marked by a material reduction in unsold consignments as compared with former years. The bulk of the fruit coming forward represents deliveries against sales, and shippers appear to show no disposition to venture on an adventurous policy of consignments. This should tend towards healthier trade conditions. The smaller shipments, by reason of the absence of any great volume of consignments, have forced a low opening level of prices and relatively small quantities of unsold fruit on the principal distributing markets such as London, Liverpool, and Amsterdam should have the effect of stimulating direct purchases.

THE AGRICULTURAL OUTLOOK IN INDIA.

The following is the report on the agricultural situation to the end of August:—

Rainfall was generally more than sufficient in all provinces except Bengal and Assam, but was unevenly distributed, especially in Madras, Bihar, and Orissa, United Provinces and Burma. In the majority of the provinces the standing crops were affected by the heavy rain and floods. In Bengal the area damaged was about ten square miles. Relief measures are being undertaken. In Lower Burma abnormal rainfall caused floods, and large areas of cultivation were swept away in Bassein district. More rain is wanted in parts of the dry zone. Irregularity of rainfall in Bengal has seriously delayed the transplanting of winter rice, and similar conditions are affecting the steeping of jute, which is also being damaged by insects in parts of West and East Bengal. In Assam want of rain is endangering the main rice crop, and the cotton crop is likely to be poor. The condition of standing crops is otherwise generally good, except in parts of the Circars and the West Coast of Madras, and in Bihar, where drought has affected the winter rice. The supply of food grain is on the whole sufficient. In Bihar and Orissa the price of rice continues to rise, although still below last year's figures. Otherwise prices are practically stationary, or show a tendency to fall. Labour continues to be available, and the condition of the people is satisfactory. Fodder is sufficient, except in parts of Bombay and Madras. The condition of agricultural stock is satisfactory, except in parts of Hyderabad, Rajputana, and the Central Provinces, where cattle disease is reported. On the whole the agricultural outlook is promising.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The Fiume Problem.

For the moment the Adriatic barometer promises fair weather. In Italy the fact is attributed to Signor Mussolini's firm stand; in Yugoslavia it is accounted for by the noticeable change in the Italian official attitude. Three weeks ago the solution of the Fiume problem that commended itself to Signor Mussolini was to call Porto Baross and the Delta Yugoslav, but to incorporate them with Fiume under Italian control. Apart from the fact that Yugoslavia would not agree, this arrangement would have spelt commercial ruin to Fiume. Late in the day it seems to have been discovered that the fate of the port was already as good as sealed, and, if the Italian attitude is correctly understood, an attempt is now being made to discover a formula which, while emphasising the Italian political ownership of Fiume, will leave its commercial development in the hands of the Yugoslavs. The project is at least worth a trial; but it remains to be seen whether the Italian Government can bring itself to the necessary measure of self-denial. The story of Fiume hardly reflects credit on Fascism. In the appointment of General Giardino as Governor, we may recognise a desire to clear the administration of the worst aspects of Fascisti terrorism; but there are so far no signs of a liberal-minded policy which would take into consideration the real interests of the town by allowing the population to have a controlling voice in its own destiny. Until that stage is reached the only virtue in any settlement that may be agreed upon will consist in the avoidance of an armed conflict.

The Janina Murders.

The Allied Commission investigating the Janina murders has forwarded its first report to the Conference of Ambassadors in Paris. All the delegates, with the exception of the Italian, are of opinion that the Greek authorities have taken every possible measure to apprehend the assassins. If this view is accepted by the Ambassadors, it will mean that Greece has escaped the penalty of having the whole of the fifty million lire deposited in a Swiss Bank confiscated without reference to the International Court at The Hague. No less important is the finding that the crime was one of vengeance and not political. In other words, the Commission rejects the Italian accusation that the Greek Government or Greek officials were behind the murders. The Italian delegate appears to consider that his country's dignity requires him to dissociate himself from all his colleagues' findings. In so doing he may be safeguarding himself with his countrymen, but he must be cutting a sorry figure in the Commission. To make matters worse, he has been responsible for an attempt to introduce on to Greek territory a detachment of Italian carabinieri, fully armed, because he considered his life endangered. Some such anxiety, no doubt, assailed the Italian fleet that bombarded the refugees' quarters in Corfu, but fortunately on the Græco-Albanian frontier Allied delegates were present, and the Japanese Chairman of the Commission was able to reassure the timid Italian officer before grave complications ensued. To the credit of the Italian Government it may be recorded that it has begun the withdrawal of the troops from Corfu before September 27, the date fixed in agreement with the Conference of Ambassadors.

Greek Politics.

Greece has shown more dignity in regard to the Corfu incident than she is able to muster in her political affairs. The saluting of the Allied flags in Phaleron Bay was carried out with the sea-front deserted and with every indication that the Greek people felt the injustice of a penalty that would never have been exacted from a Great Power. Its protest, however, has been a silent and, therefore, a dignified one. It would have been well if the solidarity of the nation in its attitude to the Janina incident could have been maintained in the settlement of its political problems. The attempt made by M. Zaimis to form a reconciliation party, in order to extricate Greece from the deadlock into which her politics have lapsed, has failed, and the veteran politician has again retired from the political arena. His withdrawal leaves the field open to the two sets of extremists—Venizelists and anti-

Digitized by Google

Venizelists—whose antagonism has never been more bitter than it is to-day. The Revolutionary Committee can hardly dare to leave the situation in the hands of either of these factions, and is still working to effect a coalition of the more moderate elements. The General Election has been postponed until December 2, and, as M. Zaimis is the only man who is regarded as capable of bridging the gulf between the Venizelists and anti-Venizelists, it is still hoped that he will be induced to come forward again.

Civil Strife in Bulgaria.

It is idle to attempt to disguise the fact that there is serious trouble in Bulgaria. The first reports of revolution were obviously exaggerated, as they would naturally be in view of their origin from neighbouring countries. Clearly, however, there has been a concerted effort at a rising; but it was indifferently organised, and the Government is still master of the situation. The insurgents are labelled with some insistence Communists, and if it be true that they have tried to give the name of "Soviet republic" to every village or town of which they have been able to take temporary possession, the movement may well have derived some of its inspiration and strength from Moscow. In all probability members of the Agrarian Party are also implicated. The success of the coup d'état of June 9 was due to its masterly organisation, its rapidity, and the fact that the support of the army had been secured. It remained, however, for the most part, a bourgeois or town movement. One of the first acts of the new Government ought to have been to win over to its side, if possible, the bulk of the peasants; but it has had other preoccupations, and may possibly have concentrated too much of its attention on improving the administration instead of consolidating its own position by securing the support of the majority of the Bulgarian people.

Proximus Ardet.

The so-called Communist rising in Bulgaria has, of course, nothing in common with the komitaji activities which are causing uneasiness in Serbia. The Yugoslav Government is reported to have included in its recent representations to the Bulgarian Government on the subject of the komitajis a reference to the treatment of the Agrarian Party; but it can hardly be supposed that the intention was to identify itself with the standard-bearers in Bulgaria of the Soviet régime. Subsequent negotiations with the Sofia Government seem to have reassured Belgrade, and there were signs of the beginning of more satisfactory relations between the two countries. The danger of the present rising is that it may encourage the komitajis, in the belief that the Zankoff Cabinet has its hands full, to renew their activities against the Serbians. In such circumstances it may well be supposed that only very strong representations on the part of the Great Powers will prevent the Yugoslav Government from carrying out its threat to occupy Bulgarian territory. If it were conceivable that the present rising should succeed and result in a Soviet administration in Bulgaria, the Powers responsible for reducing the Bulgarian army to proportions that render it incapable of maintaining order in the country will have done a grave disservice to Europe, and neither military occupation of Bulgarian sources of revenue nor any other method of exploiting the situation will remove the danger spot that the Treaty of Neuilly has introduced into the European body politic.

Indian Extremist Policy.

The proceedings of the "National" Congress at Delhi throw a good deal of light, not, indeed, on the wide field of Indian politics, but on that corner of it which is occupied by the extremist factions. What we see is a handful of sincere visionaries, and many handfuls of men with axes to grind, hopelessly at loggerheads on most questions of practical importance to the country, and hitherto united only by their common hatred of Western ideas and institutions. At the moment they are greatly disheartened, partly by the failure, which is now openly admitted, of the programme of action on which their earlier hopes were based, but still more by the fact that they have begun to waste their hatred on each other, instead of saving it all up for use against the common enemy. A new programme has now been settled, but the internal stresses seem to have been increased rather than diminished in the process, and it is doubtful whether sufficient driving power is left to make it a serious factor in the situation. Unfortunately, the moderate or liberal organisations are largely characterised by a similar lack of energy, and such danger as exists arises rather from moderate weakness than extremist strength.

The Wreckers' Programme.

From the nature of the case, the extremists' programme is almost wholly distructive. They will seek entry to the legislatures, which they formerly affected to ignore, but it is with the declared intention of wrecking them from within. They hope at the same time to paralyse the Administration by what is described as organised civil disobedience, or in practice by hiring ignorant peasants or labourers to break the law—and go to gaol. They threaten to disorganise the economic life of the country by a boycott of British Empire goods, without any active attempt to provide necessary requirements from other sources. It is not difficult to conjecture the kind of action which would be taken by French, or American, or Indian administrators confronted with such threats, but in the circumstances of the moment we prefer the British attitude of allowing the wreckers to work in the open, applying the law only when it is broken. The most interesting question just now is the amount of electoral support which will be accorded to this programme, but on this point there are absolutely no data. In a few weeks' time the electorate will speak, or possibly prefer to remain silent, and the Administration will then know how matters stand.

The Religious Difficulty.

The real trouble in India just now arises from the recrudescence of embittered feelings between Hindus and Moslems, rather than the attitude of any political faction, and the fact is obviously perturbing the minds of moderates as well as extremists. An interesting reference to it was made by Mr. Sen at the recent conference of Liberals at Benares. The speaker condemned absolutely the extremist union of hate, and offered as an alternative the idea of working down to the fundamental unity which lies below the clash of creeds. Such an idea sounds a little fantastic in Europe, where repeated attempts to find what algebraists would call the highest common factor among competing sects have hitherto met with so little practical success, but it is wholly in accordance with the trend of Indian thought, and consequently it may possibly bear fruit. The worst of it is that India contains much crude human nature as well as many lofty thinkers, and at times like the present wild men are more in evidence than philosophers. Mr. Sen has set a good example to the latter class, and if they would only come on to the platform in force, they might do much to alleviate a situation which calls urgently for treatment.

THE WEEK AT HOME.

London, Monday Evening.

Mr. Baldwin and France.

It is difficult not to be bewildered by the wild frenzies into which the so-called new relations between England and France have during the past week thrown the Press of both countries. Naturally our own journals are a little doubtful of this "re-established cordiality," but they nevertheless seem to accept it as a fact.

Yet nobody knows in the least what our Premier actually said to M. Poincaré or what England's policy in regard to the impending collapse of the Ruhr resistance really is. At the moment it appears that Paris has merely made friends with Mr. Baldwin: more than that is conjecture.

The only long view that I have heard expressed with any consistency embraces the political disruption of Germany, an enforced abandonment of our own claim to reparations, and a subsequent decrease in the hegemony of France in Europe owing to her necessity of borrowing money from us. As the future of Europe, so the holders of this view maintain, is to be with small States, there is no reason that the new Germany should not be dominated by the South Germans—the decentest Germans—once the artificial bond created by Bismarck and others has been destroyed.

Despite the political attractiveness of this view, it is hardly credible that Mr. Baldwin can have adopted it. Without doubt, the fear that has been behind our Government's mind all this anxious time has been the prospect of Germany's commercial disruption—this is what we meant when we talked of the inconsistency of the French, the illegality of the Ruhr occupation, and so on. And, therefore, although, as I have said, nobody knows how completely our Premier has accepted the French Premier's envisaging of the future, it seems at least doubtful whether England officially will not make some attempt to retain the old Germany in the economic system of Europe.

The Government's Position.

In the meantime, the trend of the Government's political stock has been downward. During the last few days, it is true, it hardened a little, but not sufficiently to abate the fears of those who are already thinking of the next elections. Loss of prestige was inevitable, in consideration of the many extraordinarily difficult questions which were handed over unanswered to Mr. Baldwin, but of the Government's loss in popularity there can be no doubt whatever. Rasher heads, indeed, are clamouring for the return of Mr. Lloyd George, and, although one can safely say that this calamity will not overflow our national cup, the fall of this froth at least shows whence the wind is blowing.

As a matter of fact, most thinkers are agreed on, or, rather, resigned to, the probability of a Labour Government the next time; unless miracles happen to decrease considerably the appalling unemployment at home, Labour is bound to romp home.

Emergence of Parties.

Notwithstanding all our national stress, there are to be found and heard fools who can think of nothing better than to lug out from their dusty shelves their cracked and worn records of party cries. As if the very words "Protection" and "Free Trade" meant anything at all to the present generation! The modern citizen knows as well as he knows that Papyrus has gone to America that there is no virtue and no salvation in these fusty and detestable catchwords—that their application can in the nature of things be of but temporary benefit. No opposition on theoretical grounds alone will convince him that outside support should not be accorded to trades like the woollen trade, the leather trade, and the lace trade, and, above all, to agriculture, but exactly how such support should be extended he is content to leave to experts.

It looks, however, as though we were in for a deluge of Protectionist and anti-Protectionist propaganda, a little of which may be read, but most of which will surely be ignored. Already the Morning Post and the Westminster Gazette are hard at it, but neither of them telling much. If only they would admit that their advice is not divinely inspired, but merely the honest view held by mortal men of England's needs for the present and the immediate future, they might cut some ice; but to push it very nearly under our noses like pre-War party propaganda, or remotely to represent it as eternal verity, is the most futile method of persuasion.

The Theatres.

Less, probably, than at any time since the War, can one legitimately grouse at the hodiernal conditions of our theatres, for at the moment are to be found plenty of plays which please both those who wish to be stimulated and those who look to the stage merely for entertainment. The number of reputable plays is quite considerable: "Magic," for example, "At Mrs. Beam's," "Ambush," "The Likes of Her," and, above all, "Hassan," about which I will perhaps write later—and this last week we have even had Shakespeare ("Cymbeline") brought to the West End. And when, in not quite irrelevant addition, it is recorded that the Chappell "ballad" concerts have ceased, orchestral music being substituted for the presumably unmarketable sugar, one must admit an improvement in our artistic outlook.

That is all very cheering to the soul, and one's pocket (consequently, one's heart) is also relieved by Mr. Charles B. Cochran's resolve to reduce the price of stalls. One can only hope that other managers, who are more prone than he to produce pieces that exercise the mind as well as the eye and ear, will admit his wisdom, or at least tentatively follow in his dashing wake.

Lord Morley.

The death of Lord Morley, a great statesman and admirable writer, not only reminds us how distant are those Victorian times in which he so nobly flourished, but shows us comparatively to how low a level politicians have now sunk. This scholarly Liberal, to whom both friend and foe paid and are paying tribute, was not unique; he was typical of the best of his age. And who of this day can be likened to him? Mr. Asquith alone, perhaps, of whom it was said when he was ousted from office in 1916, that the last gentleman in the House had gone.

In the view of this generation, Lord Morley's reconciliation of the principles of democracy with keenly individualistic action seems remarkable, but syntheses were far easier to effect in those days. Nearly everything that Lord Morley opposed has since prospered, and yet his faith in democracy was apparently unshaken. But he belonged to a class of men, found now practically nowhere in Parliament, with long vision and tenacious purpose—virtues which one day, and that not too far off, we shall have to regain. One cannot imagine that, for instance, he would at this crisis have allowed matters to smoothe themselves out, for he believed passionately in the human ordering of affairs.

Chars-a-Banc.

No one, I suppose, will deny that "sharrer-bangs" are the devil. All walkers loathe the things. "Let us take the road," says some one; but "Hark, I hear the sound of coaches, the hour of attack approaches," and pedestrians are either charging for safety to the hedge or else smothered in dust in the ditch, with the raucous gibe of a Barclay and Perked "sharrerbanger" ringing in their ears. But there is, please heaven, a possibility of the disappearance of these monstrous affairs. They are, apparently, not only a nuisance, but a danger to the public; and the police are now enforcing with heavy fines the rule against their travelling at more than twelve miles an hour. This, of course, makes them an uncommercial proposition.

Thus, it would seem, endeth the dispute for supremacy between road and rail transport. Anyone could foresee that, our roads not being built either to sustain or to contain such enormous things as thirty-five seaters, the railways would eventually come into their own again.

The End of Summer.

This year summer seemed not merely to pass: it snapped. Everyone reproached the bright intelligence who made us last Sunday week put our clocks forward (or was it back?), but he was in truth a little cleverer than we thought. For ever since that day we seem to have been jostled by the wind and stung by the rain. There never has, in time of peace, been a more miserable picture for the third week in September than my cricket eleven fielding on Saturday. It rained and it blew, yet, quite disregarding the eager democrats who in a neighbouring field were joyfully playing Rugger, and also because it was the last game of the season, we endured. Kipling was quite wrong, of course, when he talked about "flannelled fools," but . . .

In any case, autumn is now really with us. Before the day is over, night is upon us, and it is dark and there are fires awaiting us when we reach home in the evening. The sounds of cricket, the warmth of sunshine, the smell of fields even, all seem infinitely remote; mists and the dew are now everywhere. Yet this is not the whole of the picture, for no representation that makes September and October anything less than the best months in the year can be; the moons are extremely beautiful (harvest moon is upon us), and the winds are as heady as ever autumnal winds were.

"Briton" and "Britisher."

The subject at the head of this paragraph I approach with some trepidation, assuming that my readers are experts in the matter of naming correctly the inhabitants of the United Kingdom and the members of the British Empire. My excuse is that the Society for Pure English has just published a tract, written by Robert Bridges, on this fascinating and not unimportant topic. The words "Briton" and "Britisher" are, of course, rejected by the S.P.E., and, indeed, no one with an attuned ear can bear the sound of either word, the first sounding far too remote, majestical, and inhuman for our time, and the second reeking of foreign origin and of odiously immodest implication. And the word "British," the only really English word of the three in correct use, is but an adjective.

Perhaps, readers, now that the S.P.E. is asking for suggestions or expressions of opinion, may care to send their views in to THE NEAR EAST. It is curious, but possibly not so strange, that this country and Empire should have evolved no name for its inhabitants; all part of that "absence of mind," one supposes, in which no foreigner can believe, but which alone can explain a thousand and one acts in our history.

The Charms of Cymry.

The artistic propensities of the Welsh are not as developed as perhaps they might be, but in some cases, it seems, their remarkable religious instincts lead them to purer realms of art than we can attain. A certain superior scorn is being poured out by the lofty-minded English on one Mr. Jones, of the Portmadoc Town Council, who persuaded his community to cover up on Sundays the posters which disfigure the Town Hall. Petty and Puritan, we say; of such intolerance is the backwardness of the Welsh derived. But in truth Mr. Jones's action should be widely applauded and imitated. Portmadoc is, I understand, a fishing village; and anyone who knows the Sabbath calm of fishing villages will welcome the refraining from senseless gazing at vulgar posters by the respectable villagers. Of course, the incorrigible Saxon will say that the Welshman sold his soul to the man who put posters up on the Town Hall and now tries to save his skin (in such distant parts, still, probably, from Hell fire) by shielding them from Heaven's eye on Sundays; but, apart from all such philosophising, we would give much to be able to spend our Sundays and never see a poster.

The Fahmy Murder Trial.

Eclipsing in popular interest even the imminent return of Saad Pasha Zaghloul, the Fahmy murder trial, now proceeding in London, is the topic of almost universal conversation. Aly Bey Fahmy was so well known in Cairo, and the revelations being made in London are so sensational, that everything else has for the moment been forgotten. The Arabic newspapers are spending large sums on having full reports of the affair cabled out, one paper, Al Ahram, publishing practically a verbatim account of each day's proceedings. As an indication of the interest here, a remark a newsboy made to a would-be purchaser of the Ahram, a morning newspaper, yesterday afternoon, is interesting. "Now this Fahmy case is on," said the boy, "you couldn't buy a copy of the Ahram in the afternoon for all the money in Egypt."

The Wafd Leader's Return.

The authorities have been feeling slightly nervous as to what may happen when Zaghloul Pasha returns to Egypt next Monday. Yesterday there was a conference at the offices of the Ministry of the Interior, as a result of which detailed instructions have been issued regarding what will and what will not be allowed in the way of a popular welcome. In effect, what it all comes to is that individuals may cheer and show their joy as much as they wish, but there must be no organised demonstrations or processions. There is no reason for expecting any trouble, and the authorities have drafted hundreds of extra policemen into Alexandria from the provinces to cope with the situation, but Alexandria is a town where a very big row has often started from insignificant beginnings. Like most seaports, Alexandria has a large floating population, including at this time of year thousands of Saidis, notoriously turbulent characters, who are always ready for mischief. The existence of thousands of foreigners of the lower classes, living cheek by jowl with natives, has been the prime cause of several disturbances in the past, and is another feature peculiar to Alexandria. So that, although popular feeling is now quieter than it has been for years past, and everything points to Zaghloul's homecoming going off perfectly peacefully, everybody will breathe a sigh of relief when he is safely packed into the train for Cairo. No apprehensions are felt of serious trouble in the capital.
